Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report and urge its adoption. In all candor, I cannot say that I am completely satisfied with the legislation but I realize that none of us can ever hope to have 100 percent of his legislative desires satisfied on such a complicated and controversial a subject as is before us.

The Kennedy-Ervin bill passed the other body by a vote of 90 to 1 and came to the House committee where it was amended 102 times before assuming its final form as the Elliott bill. Much was made of the number of amendments—some said it was weakened, others said it was strengthened. I say it was vastly improved.

This body worked its will in rejecting the Elliott bill in favor of what has been called the Landrum-Griffin bill. Those of us who supported the Elliott bill are flattered by the fact that our colleagues, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANDRUM] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GRIFFIN], adopted 80 of the 102 amendments without change and 8 others with small change. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the bill which went to conference was not less than 80 percent the Elliott bill. The 20 percent which was the Elliott bill which did not become a part of Landrum-Griffin was the part to which the minority leader, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], referred to as the "killer."

The joint conferees adopted not less than 75 amendments to the House-passed bill. These amendments represent a return to the original committee, or Elliott, bill. The facts are, therefore, that the conference report on which we are about to vote represents a great improvement over the House-passed measure. We have before us what is really 95 percent Elliott bill—a complete vindication of the position taken by those of us who rejected the Landrum-Griffin bill in favor of the more sane, reasonable committee bill.

Following are 15 of the most important improvements made by the conferees to the Landrum-Griffin bill:

MAJOR CHANGES MADE IN GRIFFIN-LANDRUM BILL BY CONFERENCE COMMITTEE

The following changes safeguarding the rights of workingmen were made upon the insistence of the conferees:

1. Subcontracting: The legality of restricting subcontracting in the garment industry in order to keep out sweatshops was established.

2. Consumer appeals: The right to publicize nonunion goods to consumers, without causing a secondary work stoppage, is recognized in the conference agreement. Employees will also be entitled to publicize, without picketing, the fact that a wholesaler or retailer sells goods of a company involved in a labor dispute. All appeals for a consumer boycott would have been barred by House bill.

3. Organizational picketing: The conference report preserves the right to engage in organizational picketing provided that a petition for an election is filed within a reasonable time not to exceed 30 days. Unless the union won the election, the picketing would have to cease. The House bill would have virtually banned organizational picketing.

4. Organizational picketing: The right to engage in purely informational picketing without filing a petition for an election is secured provided that the picketing does not halt the pickup or delivery of goods or the rendition of services by the employees of other employers.

5. Primary strikes: The conference report recognizes the right to engage in primary strikes and primary picketing, thereby eliminating the danger that the House bill would sometimes invalidate such picketing.

6. Defense to picketing: Although the conference agreement contains a prohibition upon picketing an employer who has a contract with another union, language was added to the House bill which would make it a defense to show that the General Counsel had issued a complaint charging the employer with unlawfully dominating, maintaining, or assisting the other union.

7. Union liability for damage suits: The section imposing liability on labor unions for damages in the case of unlawful organizational picketing was eliminated.

8. Federal-State jurisdiction ("no man's land"): The conference report permits the States to take jurisdiction over labor cases over which the Board currently refuses to assume jurisdiction. Under the House bill the NLRB could have refused jurisdiction over additional cases. The Board's present jurisdictional standards are broader than they have ever been, thus insuring more unions and employers protection of the act.

9. Economic strikers: The House bill contained no provision permitting economic strikers to vote in representation elections. The conference provision permits strikers to vote in representation elections within 1 year after the commencement of a strike.

10. Struck work: The conference report preserves existing law on the question of the right of labor to refuse to work on struck goods. The House bill would have limited this right.

11. Prehire contracts in the construction industry: Conference report permits prehire contracts in construction industry accepting Senate provision on this subject. Conference report also permits unions and prime contractors in construction industry to enter into agreements by which contractor refuses to subcontract to nonunion operators.

12. Bonding: Conference report places a $500,000 limitation on amount of bond required to be taken by a union officer; the House bill had no such limitation.

13. Elections: Conference report makes the Secretary of Labor responsible for bringing suits in a Federal court to remedy improper elections. The House bill would have provided that individual members could bring suits in U.S. district courts to overturn improper elections.

14. Membership lists: House bill gave candidates for union office the right to inspect and copy from membership lists in union shops. Conference report restricted this to one inspection 30 days prior to an election without right to copy.

15. Employer reporting: Conference strengthened immeasurably employer reporting section 203 which was meaningless in the House bill.

Mr. Speaker, I have just set forth the 15 major areas in which the conferees improved the House-passed bill. Following is a summary of these items on eight major points in considerably more detail. There are tremendous improvements, for they represent the return to the American labor movement of its right of survival. They are:

In the 12 days during which the conference met, the majority of the conferees secured important changes in the restrictive provisions of the Landrum-Griffin bill, thereby protecting traditional and essential rights of workingmen seeking to improve conditions of employment. It is important that the House should note these changes:

1. "No man's land": The conferees insisted upon an amendment which prevents the NLRB from declining to exercise its existing jurisdiction and thereby depriving both employers and employees of the protection of the National Labor Relations Act. The Landrum-Griffin bill would have allowed the Board to surrender unlimited jurisdiction to the States, 35 of which provide no protection to the rights to organize and bargain collectively. The conference report prevents further cession. The current standards of the NLRB assure the widest effective exercise of Federal jurisdiction in the history of the National Labor Relations Act.

2. Organizational picketing: The House bill would have forbidden virtually all organizational picketing, even though the pickets did not stop truck deliveries or exercise other economic coercion. The amendments adopted in the conference secure the right to engage in all forms of organizational picketing up to the time of an election in which the employees can freely express their desires with respect to the choice of a bargaining representative. When the picketing results in economic pressure through the refusal of other employees to cross the picket line, the bill would require a prompt election. Purely informational picketing cannot be curtailed under the conference report, although even this privilege would have been denied by the Landrum-Griffin measure.

3. Secondary boycotts: The secondary boycott provisions of the House bill would have curtailed legitimate union activities. Accordingly, the conferees insisted that the report secure the following rights:

(a) The right to engage in primary strikes and primary picketing even though the employees of other employers refused to cross the picket line.

(b) The right of employees to refuse to work on goods farmed out from an establishment in which the employees are on strike.

(c) The right to appeal to consumers by methods other than picketing asking them to refrain from buying goods made by nonunion labor and to refrain from trading with a retailer who sells such goods.

(d) The right of labor unions representing employees in the apparel and clothing industry to refuse to work for a jobber or contractor who subcontracts parts of the process of production to nonunion subcontractors. This guarantee, which was opposed by the House conferees for 2 weeks, is absolutely essential to the stability of these industries. The bill makes special mention of the industry because it has peculiar problems.

The chief effect of the conference agreement, therefore, will be to plug loopholes in the secondary boycott provisions of the National Labor Relations Act. There has never been any dispute about the desirability of plugging these artificial loopholes.

4. "Hot cargo." The Landrum-Griffin bill extended the hot cargo provisions of the Senate bill to all agreements between an employer and a labor union by which the employer agrees not to do business with another concern. The Senate insisted upon a qualification for the clothing and apparel industries and for agreements relating to work to be done at the site of a construction project. Both changes were necessary to avoid serious damage to the pattern of collective bargaining in these industries.

5. Economic strikers: The conferees adopted the substance of the provisions of the Senate bill reversing the Taft-Hartley rule that economic strikers who have been replaced should not vote in an NLRB election. This is a highly important change, for the Taft-Hartley prohibition had opened the door to union-busting practices.

6. Prehire agreements: The conference report incorporates the provisions of the Senate bill authorizing labor unions and contractors in the construction industry to negotiate prehire agreements. The Landrum-Griffin bill contains restrictive and unworkable provisions on this point.

7. Employer reports: The conference provision adopts the substance of the Senate bill dealing with the reports to be filed by employers and labor relations consultants, the purpose of which is to disclose to the Government and public opinion any repetition of the unsavory practices brought to light by the McClellan committee. One of the important consequences of these reports will be the full disclosure of sums of money spent by employers to finance "front" organizations distributing propaganda designed to prevent further union organization.

8. Membership lists. The House bill would have required a labor union to open its membership lists to any candidate in connection with an election of officers. Although this requirement is fair in the case of bona fide candidates, it created grave dangers that "stooges" would obtain the membership lists for subversive organizations or commercial use. The conferees secured additional safeguards by limiting the right to one inspection within 30 days prior to an election, without the right to make copies of the list.

Mr. Speaker, I invite the attention of the Members of the House to page 17901 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 3, 1959, in which Senator KENNEDY and Senator CARROLL establish a carefully thought out legislative history for the "no man's land" provisions of the conference report. The Members will note that the committees of both Houses of the Congress will watch most carefully the operations of the States in this area.

While I have serious reservations regarding the conference report proposal to cede to the States part of the traditional Federal responsibility under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, I shall support the proposition because of its limitations. We are not giving the National Labor Relations Board the right to abandon its responsibility. We are, in fact, limiting that right and are saying—quite clearly—that they may assume even more jurisdiction than they now have, and that they must follow our directions most carefully. They must preserve the guarantees given to the Nation's working people under the National Labor Relations Act, and they—the NLRB—can take more jurisdiction, not less. The committees of the Congress will keep a careful watch to see that this limited grant is not abused. I see no analogy between this section and section 14B of the Taft-Hartley Act, and no such analogy was intended by the joint conferees.

Mr. Speaker, in connection with the conference report there is one more matter of great importance which must be made clear if there is to be a valid legislative history accompanying this vital legislation. I did not have an opportunity to see or to read the statement of the managers on the part of the House before it appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD today. Upon a very hasty examination of this document, I find at least one statement therein upon which I should like to make this comment for purposes of clarification. The last paragraph of the statement is correct when it refers to the fact that the conference adopted the provision of the Senate bill permitting prehire agreements in the building and construction industry. In these circumstances, the considerations in the Senate committee report which were before the Senate when it debated the bill are governing in determining the intent of the language on this subject in the conference report.

With respect to the phrase in the last paragraph of the statement that nothing in section 705 is intended "to authorize the use of force, coercion, strikes, or picketing to compel any person to enter into such prehire agreements," I would state that literally speaking, the above quoted phrase is not incorrect. However, it should be entirely clear that there is no language in the conference report which justifies any implication that section 705 is intended to deny the right of a union to strike or to picket for a legal object, such as a prehire agreement in the building and construction industry which is validated by section 705.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I would like to state that I am grateful to have had the opportunity to serve on the conference committee. It has been a terrible ordeal, but one which brings rewards in that I have had the opportunity to espouse the cause of reason and moderation in a time when the Congress and the Nation have been engulfed by the demands of extremists at each end of the spectrum. There have been those who will be satisfied with nothing less than the destruction of the Nation's trade union movement and those who will be satisfied with nothing less than the right to trample, unfettered, over the destinies of those whom they purport to represent as labor leaders. Neither side has been pleased, and so it should be. We have offered here today a compromise which will clean the rot out of the labor movement without destroying that wonderful segment of our society. It is an honest and honorable compromise. I am not completely satisfied with the legislation, but it is, at least, a vast improvement over the bill which the House enacted under the pressure of uninformed, but powerful influences. The Congress of the United States has done the legislating and in so doing has done its duty.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, it is my considered judgment that the position taken by the supporters of the Elliott bill was substantially vindicated by the conference report. Indeed, I will go one step further and assert that the bill we are completing final action on today is closer to the Elliott bill than to any of the other bills which were considered by the House last month.

Although naturally I have reservations with regard to some of the language in this report, it is my judgment that the compromise worked out by the conferees represents a middle-road approach to the complex problems which confronted the conference.

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of our colleagues I have analyzed the major amendments adopted by the conference and have compared the final product with the pertinent sections of the Elliott bill.

Here are the main points of comparison as I see them:

First. No man's land: The Elliott bill required the NLRB to hear and decide all cases falling within the Federal jurisdiction. The Landrum-Griffin bill turned all no man's land cases over to the States, and conferred discretion on the NLRB to decline to hear cases which now are within the purview of its jurisdiction and turn them over to States. In other words, the Landrum bill placed no limitation whatsoever upon the Board's power to narrow its jurisdictional boundaries and deny the protection now accorded by the NLRB.

The conference compromise authorizes the NLRB to cede the no man's land cases to the States but simultaneously mandates the Board not to contract its jurisdiction. This is a very constructive step, as the NLRB is presently exercising the widest effective Federal jurisdiction in the history of the National Labor Relations Act. One other highly significant fact deserves notice. The conference report does not inhibit the Board from expanding its scope of activity in the future: thus if some future Board has the will—and the necessary congressional support—to exercise plenary jurisdiction and take all cases—the Elliott solution—such a solution is a permissible one under the conference agreement.

Second. Organizational picketing: The Landrum bill forbade all organizational picketing with one exception which permitted recognition picketing for 30 days by unions having at least a 30-percent membership in a particular plant. The Elliott bill forbade organizational picketing after an election—unless the union won the election, or subsequently secured a majority without picketing—and accelerated the holding of elections so that one might be secured by either labor or management within 45 days from the time a petition was filed. In other words, the most important distinction between the two bills on this subject was that the committee bill did not forbid picketing before an election. As I read the report, it is plain that the basic assumptions of the Elliott approach prevailed, and the amendments adopted by the conference allow organizational picketing up to the time of an election, with the proviso that when such picketing results in overt economic pressure—by stopping the flow of transportation, or through refusal of other employees to cross a picket line—a prompt election is mandatory. The conference report also protects informational picketing that does not result in economic coercion—a right of free speech which would have been denied by the Landrum bill. Thus, clearly the conference compromise in this area hews much closer to the line drawn by the Elliott bill than that of Landrum-Griffin.

Third. Secondary boycotts: The secondary boycott provisions of the Elliott bill would have closed the "hot cargo contract" loophole which has been a source of power which has been abused by Mr. Hoffa and the Teamsters Union. The Landrum-Griffin secondary boycott provision was so broadly drawn that some of us, during the debate on this issue 3 weeks ago, expressed grave doubts that the reach of this language was so broad that many legitimate union activities would be curtailed. My colleagues will recall that during my opening statement in support of the Elliott bill, I asserted that the Landrum-Griffin secondary boycott section would outlaw primary picketing even where a bona fide labor dispute existed over wages and working conditions. The conference recognized the validity of this argument and affixed a proviso to protect lawful primary picketing.

In addition, the conferees wisely set out to plug the few remaining loopholes in the secondary boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act without impinging upon basic rights vital to some segments of the labor movement. Hence, the amendments adopted in conference: (a) Protect the stability of the garment industry—with its unique problems and traditional practices—a move, I might say, which will be applauded both by management and labor spokesmen of this industry; (b) affirm the right of employees to refuse to work on "struck goods"; and (c) protect the free speech right to appeal to consumers by nonpicketing methods.

It was the contention of supporters of the Elliott bill in debate that they were not opposed to the closing of the artificial loopholes in the Taft-Hartley secondary boycott embargo providing precise language was used which would prevent encroachment on the beneficent and necessary rights of trade unions. It is understandable, then, that we regard the conference solution in this section as a sound one which largely vindicates our point of view.

Fourth. The right to vote of economic strikers: The conference adopted the essential point of view taken by the Elliott bill by according the right to vote to economic strikers. This right was qualified by a reasonable 1-year limitation on voting.

Fifth. Prehire agreements: The conference report incorporates the essential provisions of the Elliott bill authorizing labor unions and contractors in the construction industry to negotiate prehire agreements. The more restrictive and unworkable provisions of Landrum-Griffin were rejected.

Sixth. Criminal penalties for forceable interference with rights guaranteed by the act: This was a major dispute between the supporters of the Elliott and Landrum-Griffin bills during floor debate. It was the contention of the backers of the Elliott bill that the Landrum-Griffin penalties were so stringent that they might deter honest men from seeking and holding union office. We argued that the rights conferred by the act were so numerous and varied that in most instances the penalty did not fit the crime with the result that this sanction would be both harsh and unworkable. Our argument on this point prevailed and the Landrum-Griffin bill was quietly amended so that the drastic felony penalty was reduced to a misdemeanor. This solution was then adopted by the conference report.

Seventh. The conferees also reached into the Elliott bill and adopted one of its provisions which will enable the NLRB to handle more cases, and to handle them more expeditiously, by decentralizing its supervision of elections.

These, Mr. Speaker, are some of the reasons why, in good conscience, I feel that those who supported the Elliott bill can vote for the conference report today.

Mr. QUIGLEY. Mr. Speaker I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIGLEY. Mr. Speaker, they said it could not be done. And, frankly, Mr. Speaker, for a long time and with good reason I thought they might be right. I suspect that if the truth were known, that there were moments when all 14 of the conferees were themselves certain that they could never come to an agreement. Fortunately, however, this thought never came to a majority of the 14 at the same time. As a consequence, to their credit, to the delight of their colleagues and to what, I trust, will be the ultimate good of the Nation, the House and Senate conferees finally came to an agreement on a labor-management reform bill.

That bill is now to become the law of the land. The other body has already passed it by the overwhelming vote of 95 to 2. The vote in this House will be somewhat less overwhelming but nonetheless the measure is certain to clear here today with a preponderance of votes in its favor. No one has any doubt that the President will sign it into law.

We all know why this has happened. It is not just because of the determination and patience displayed by the members of the conference committee as they struggled with the almost impossible task of reconciling differences in legislation as difficult and divergent on a subject as emotionally and politically charged as the separate labor measures passed by each House of the Congress. The conferees acted as they did because every last one of them wanted a bill. They knew that just about every one of their colleagues in both bodies on both sides of the aisle wanted a bill. But the conferees acted as they did and the Congress has and will act as it will because all of us know that the people in this country want a law which they trust and hope and pray will give them the answer to the sickening display that they have watched on their television screens during the almost 2½ years of disclosures before the McClellan committee. This is why the American people have demanded a bill and this is why the Congress will give them the bill now before us.

To what extent this demand was spontaneous or how much it may have been carefully manufactured I do not think it is necessary or appropriate for me to comment upon at this time. Only the most naive among us would fail to recognize the phoniness in many of the demands that were part of a very obvious builtup pressure to which we were all subjected a few weeks back when the issue was being considered on the floor of this House. However, only those of us who are completely blind would fail to recognize that despite all the stimulation and the simulation there was and is a real demand in this country for effective legislative action to curb the excesses and abuses that have unfortunately made their way into labor-management relation matters. How real this demand may be I cannot say. That it is real I am certain.

How adequate to the needs of this demand is the bill now before us I cannot say either. Only time and a lot of future court decisions will really tell. In other words, how really good or really bad a bill we are passing today no one can honestly say with certainty. Time alone will tell whether the decision we make today is truly right or quite wrong, but at the moment we do not have that kind of time. In a very short order, the roll will be called and we will make our decision. We will make that decision not on the basis of how good or how bad a law it will prove to be but on the basis of how good or bad a bill we believe it to be at this moment.

When that moment comes the choice we face will be "yes" or "no." When your name is called, under the rules of the House no member can vote "maybe" or "perhaps" or only for part of the bill, however much such a vote might accurately reflect your true feelings and honest views of the measure being voted upon.

When my name is reached I shall vote "yes." This is a vote born of the twin conviction that, first, in the words of the junior Senator from Massachusetts who chaired the conference committee which produced this bill, "it is the best bill we can get and still get a bill," and, secondly, the further conviction on my part that we must have a bill.

In the less than 48 hours since the conferees finally agreed, I have not—nor for that matter has any Member in this body—had the opportunity to study in detail every one of the 137 pages of the final bill. What we are doing here today is in fact a very dramatic demonstration of the congressional committee system in operation. The vote today, just as the vote late last night in the other body, is nothing so much as a vote of confidence in the work and the integrity of the members of the conference committee. If we are honest with ourselves, we must admit that our vote will reflect much more our faith in the conferees than our knowledge of their handiwork.

I have, however, in the limited time available, made as complete a study as I possibly could, not only of the bill itself but of the all-important conference report. On the basis of this admittedly unthorough study, it is my conclusion that the bill for which I am about to vote could best be described as a good bill with some bad parts.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for today, just like the public press in recent days, is certain to be cluttered up with a lot of pure semantics. To illustrate what I mean, I would merely mention that at one stage of the conference, one of the conferees publicly stated that up to that point 90 percent of what the conferees had adopted was Landrum-Griffin. This newsless news was promptly relayed to the American people through the media of the Nation's press, radio, and television. I do not think anyone would deny that the final draft of the bill is more like the House-passed Landrum-Griffin bill than the Senate-passed Kennedy bill. Yet this tells us nothing. When anyone suggests that the final bill is, say 85 percent Landrum-Griffin, you must keep in mind that about 75 percent to 80 percent of the Landrum-Griffin bill was itself lifted lock, stock, and barrel from the Elliott bill reported by the House Committee on Education and Labor. I do not want to add to the confusion by getting involved in this numbers game or in a lot of meaningless names. I merely want to state that when, on the many matters of internal union reform covered by the first six titles of the bill, the conferees moved, as they did, away from the Senate-passed bill and toward the House version, they were, in fact, in most cases moving in the right direction. I will leave it to others to quibble over the matter of whether the language finally adopted was more like Landrum or Griffin or Kennedy or Elliott or Kearns or what. My own suspicion is that in a good many cases the language finally hit upon was more like Cox.

On the other hand, when it came to dealing with the all-important seventh title of the bill—the Taft-Hartley amendments—I am grateful that the Senate conferees were as successful as they were in getting the pendulum to swing as far back as it did in the direction of fairness and sanity. I would have been happier if it had gone further, but I am pleased that, for example, to get at the evils of blackmail or extortion picketing, the conferees did not follow the Landrum-Griffin approach of—for all practical purposes—outlawing all organization picketing no matter what the circumstances. Again, for example, I was pleased that in the blind haste to get at corruption the conferees opened their eyes long enough to see some of the realities in the garment industry and building trades and to amend the bill accordingly.

On the other hand, I deeply regret that having come so close to what I consider to be an almost ideal solution to the "no man's land" problem when they had the Prouty amendment before them, that the conferees finally fell short of this much-needed goal. In my judgment, there is no question that the one section in the bill that could be used as a vicious anti-union device is section 701(a). This is the H.R. 3 provision in this bill. The Taft-Hartley law already has one H.R. 3 provision and it has fathered the rash of so-called right-to-work statutes that since 1947 have been put upon the statute books of too many States. Now today we are adding a second H.R. 3 section to Taft-Hartley. This I truly deemed to be unfortunate. I recognize that the conferees did succeed in improving the language of this section and to build in safeguards for the rights of employees in small business which were not present in the original Landrum-Griffin bill. As I said before, only time will tell whether what I believe to be the antiunion potential of section 701(a) develops and, if it does, whether the administrative remedy for such a situation provided for by the conferees will prove adequate.

Ironically, while section 701(a) is the worst section in the bill, from the point of view of the unions in my own State, it may prove to be the best. This seeming contradiction arises from the fact that Pennsylvania is one of the States with a State labor relations act and having a State labor relations board ready to administer it. From now on, where the NLRB leaves off in Pennsylvania, the Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board will take over, and when it does the applicable and controlling law will be the State's "little Wagner Act."

On August 13, when my every effort and my every vote fell short of producing a better labor-management reform bill, I voted to send the Landrum-Griffin bill to conference. This was not, I assure you, a vote of confidence in Landrum-Griffin but rather a vote of hope that the conferees might succeed where the House had failed—to write a reform bill which would be both effective and fair. Now that the conferees have reported, I cannot honestly say that my hopes have been fully realized but neither could I say that they have been dashed. I do not think that the bill we are about to pass is either completely effective or fair. However, considering the forces at work and considering the odds against the conferees producing any bill at all, what they did was in balance a remarkable, even an unbelievable, accomplishment. I will cast my vote with certain misgivings which I trust time will demonstrate unjustified. I will also cast my vote with the fond hope that principles of union democracy which we have today attempted to write into law may prove to be a great new wellspring of good unionism—in every meaning of the word—in this country. As the senior Senator from Minnesota so eloquently pointed out to the Members of the other body last evening, the contributions which the unions have made and are making to the welfare of this country and the cause of freedom everywhere can never be adequately measured and are too seldom appreciated by most Americans in and out of unions and, I might add, in or out of this Congress. My hope is that today marks the end of a short, somewhat sordid chapter in what has been and will continue to be the great and glorious history of the trade union movement in America.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, it has been mentioned here that we have a good conference report. We do have. However, I did not realize so many people now want to adopt this labor baby. But, I believe we should leave it with its natural father, the Landrum-Griffin bill, because that is what it is, and because the conference committee, in its deliberations, in the final analysis, has adopted the basic principles that were voted on in this House.

Now, I am, frankly, very happy with the conference report. We have corrected many of the evils, but we have not in any way put in the legislation one thing that will hurt the legitimate organizations of working people in this country. We have not done one thing that will prevent a man from joining a union if he wants to. We have in the field of secondary boycotts eliminated a very serious evil. What has been happening to the Burt Manufacturing Co. and other companies in similar situations cannot happen in the future. It is not going to be necessary to have injunctions to prevent one union from picketing another. In fact, the final provisions contained in the Landrum-Griffin bill are these, among others: A bill of rights; requiring all unions to report; outlawing all hot cargo agreements; closing all the secondary boycott loopholes; dealing effectively with blackmail organization picketing; and providing a realistic and workable solution for the no-man's problem.

Mr. Speaker, it was a rather difficult situation for the chairman of the conference. He was up against the very difficult problem in view of the fact that there was so much in the Landrum-Griffin bill that was not in the Senate-passed bill. I have the feeling—and I just make this as my own observation—that there may have been a few political considerations in the conference.

Then right in the middle of this we received the threatening letter from Mr. Carey in which he informed us, in no uncertain terms, that those of us who had supported the Landrum-Griffin bill would not have a chance to come back here in the next Congress. Mr. Carey did not speak for all of the union leaders because I think the legitimate union leaders of this country realize that the rank and file workers wanted the Landrum-Griffin bill.

This letter is typical. I have enough union members in my district to back up this stand. I had my staff go through the file and pick out letters from union members asking for this bill. Everyone is free to come over and look at them, if he likes. This is a typical letter.

DEAR MR. AYRES: We want to thank you for the position you have taken concerning labor reform.

We as members of Teamsters Local 24 know the great need for such legislation.

The labor leaders say they are going to defeat all of you men who voted for this labor bill. As far as we know the only votes controlled by the labor leaders here in Akron, Ohio, are their own.

The people wanted the Landrum-Griffin bill, and I am happy that they got it.

Which bill did Congress pass?

First. When S. 1555 was reported from the Senate Labor Committee, of which Senator KENNEDY is chairman, its principal titles dealt only with reporting, trusteeships, and elections.

(a) Under the existing Taft-Hartley law, all unions, regardless of size, must now file annual financial reports in order to obtain elections or file unfair labor practice charges with the NLRB. The reports which would have been required under S. 1555—as reported by the Senate committee—were almost identical to those now being filed; however, the bill would have permitted the exemption of any or all unions having fewer than 200 members.

(b) The only proposed amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act then in the bill were, first, an unworkable provision dealing with no man's land; and, second, several "sweeteners" demanded by union leaders.

On August 3, 1959, Senator KENNEDY made a speech in Oregon to the AFL–CIO State convention. Following is a quotation from the official text of his address:

I do not say that the bill (S. 1555) as it finally passed the Senate was perfect in every respect. Certainly I do not blame the AFL–CIO for trying to change some of the amendments added on the Senate floor. Certainly I share their regret that the reasonable, fair and responsible bill reported by the Senate Labor Committee—worked out carefully with President Meany and his lawyers, and supported by the executive council—was altered—undesirably and unfortunately altered—on the floor of a supposedly friendly Senate.

Second. What were the amendments adopted on the Senate floor?

(a) Senator MCCLELLAN's bill of rights would have failed, and there would have been no bill of rights for union members in the Senate-passed bill, except for the tie-breaking vote of Vice President NIXON. Senator KENNEDY voted against the McClellan bill of rights.

(b) Hot cargo: A very limited amendment was adopted on the Senate floor which would have outlawed only some of the Teamsters Union hot cargo contracts. Hot cargo is only one of the secondary boycott loopholes.

(c) Other secondary boycotts: Senator KENNEDY opposed efforts made on the Senate floor to close the other secondary boycott loopholes.

(d) Blackmail picketing: Senator KENNEDY opposed amendments offered on the Senate floor which would have dealt effectively with this deadly weapon used against the small businessman and his employees. The Senate finally adopted a very weak provision which was hardly more than a restatement of existing law.

Third. The Landrum-Griffin bill, as it passed the House, among other provisions (a) contained a meaningful bill of rights for union members; (b) required all unions to report; (c) outlawed all hot cargo agreements; (d) closed all the secondary boycott loopholes; (e) dealt effectively with blackmail organization picketing; (f) provided a realistic and workable solution for the no man's problem.

Fourth. The Senate-House conference adopted the House-passed bill with only a few modifications and clarifying amendments.

Which bill did Congress pass?

In my judgment it was the Griffin-Landrum bill.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, the righteous indignation with which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. AYRES] rises to discuss Mr. James Carey's letters to the Congress, does the gentleman from Ohio credit. It is always a good thing when the Congress of the United States witnesses such moral fervor. A sense of outrage, a bit of anger is a healthy thing.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear the fervor with which the gentleman from Ohio denounced the efforts of James Carey who suggested to Members of Congress who voted for Landrum-Griffin that they were, in fact, casting an antilabor vote—one which could be held against them by labor.

Mr. Speaker, it may be that I do not appreciate double standards, or it may be that there is a new House rule of which I am unaware, which says that only labor can be criticized for pressure mail and for lobbying in its own interest. If I am violating such a rule, I ask your pardon and the pardon of the distinguished gentlemen who have told us of their sense of outrage at Jim Carey's letter. If there is no such rule, I wonder why it is that so little of this fine moral sensitivity has been expended upon such outrageous lobbying tactics as those, for example, used by the chairman of the Republican National Committee. That gentleman, Mr. Speaker, frankly and unblushingly described his lobby techniques, and his comments were reprinted in the Washington Post—the day after the vote, of course. Under unanimous consent, I include the news story to which I refer at this point in my remarks:

MORTON SUGGESTS FEDERAL INSTALLATION CLEARING HOUSE

THRUSTON B. MORTON, chairman of the Republican National Committee, sees a need in the Eisenhower administration for a clearinghouse to review proposed closings of Federal installations.

He said yesterday the party is trying to "get a setup, I don't know whether it will be in the White House or not, where if any installation has to be closed they will let somebody with political savy look at it."

"If the action can just as well wait until after an election, let us do that," he proposed.

But MORTON urgently felt the need for such a clearinghouse Thursday. He said he was trying to persuade two Members of the House, both from labor districts, to support the administration's labor bill. One declined flatly, claiming it would be political suicide. The other reluctantly agreed.

Before the day was over, MORTON related an announcement was made that a Federal installation would be closed in the district of the Member who was supporting the bill and that a new installation would be opened in the other Member's district.

"We got to that one just in time and got it straightened out," he added.

I understand similar pressures were used at the time of the vote to override the veto on the public works appropriation bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not suggest that the chairman of the GOP National Committee should not have lobbied for Landrum-Griffin. The punitive provisions of that bill—happily left behind on the floor of the conference committee—fully expressed the antilabor attitudes of the members and the backers of the Republican Party. As chairman of the national committee, that gentleman had a duty to lobby for the legislation for which his party stands. So I do not criticize the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky for doing the job to which he was assigned by his party and his President. If, as Members on the other side of the aisle have admitted, they have been threatened with being replaced in their own primaries if they voted against Landrum-Griffin, this may cause some concern. But I do not believe that any Member on either side of the aisle has voted as he did on this controversial issue because of fear of electoral reprisal. I do not think, however, Mr. Speaker, that the use of Federal installations—the opening and closing of such installations in a Member's district, is a proper way of "persuading" a Member of this House that a party-sponsored bill is necessarily sound legislation. In the light of the statements by the able, active, and effective chairman of the GOP National Committee, I am certainly moved to congratulate the Members opposite who voted against Landrum-Griffin, for the courage which they demonstrated. It is my sincere hope that these courageous Members of the opposite party will not have too many installations closed in their districts, and that their opponents in the coming primaries will not be too openly supported by the administration. I think we can hope for a little finesse, at least.

Thousands of letters have been received in recent weeks on the labor-management reform bill. The pressure mail on Landrum-Griffin demonstrated clearly the truth of the statement of the Senator from Arizona, who was one of its strongest backers, Mr. GOLDWATER, when he said, "To the people of the country, Landrum-Griffin is the bill they want, even if they don't know what is in it." Landrum-Griffin, Mr. Speaker, was the beneficiary of a vast amount of pressure letters signed by people who evidently did not know what was in it, but directed and inspired by people who knew exactly what was in it.

This propaganda was successful beyond the wildest dreams of the professional lobbyist. Big business pressure groups sold the Landrum-Griffin bill to the people and to the House on the specious grounds that it was tougher on racketeers than were the other bills at hand. These lobbyists, Mr. Speaker, deserve to bear a little of the righteous indignation which my friend from Ohio has heaped upon Mr. Jim Carey.

It is certainly true that pressure from Hoffa's lobbyists was just as intense and just as carefully inspired as was pressure from the management side. But much has been said about labor pressures and little has been said of the other pressures.

Last night I leafed through my voluminous files of correspondence on the labor bills. I have extracted from those files, without any difficulty, a few of the more overbearing examples of pressure mail. These are not, by any means, all the letters of this type that I have received. But they are typical. They are typical in that they combine an assertion that I will probably vote as labor dictates but with a firm insistence that I must vote as their—not my—conscience directs. In several of these letters, Mr. Speaker, you will notice a thinly veiled threat—or an unveiled threat—in regard to my political future. And, for the most part, they display either a complete ignorance of what was in the Landrum-Griffin bill, or complete indifference to its effect upon the people of this country. These are the letters which are supposed to reflect public demand. These are the reasonable, thoughtful, persuasive letters which the gentlemen who have been so indignant about Jim Carey have consistently forgotten to mention.

It is time for anger, Mr. Speaker. It is time for anger when a miller in Illinois can be so arrogant as to refer to the House of Representatives as "yellow-bellied mollycoddles" because some of us do not share his antiunion sympathies. Under unanimous consent, I include his letter at this point in my remarks:

DEAR MADAM: Last night I listened to President Eisenhower make his appeal to the American people to support the American way of life on labor legislation.

We are getting in a pretty sad state of affairs when our President has to go to the people, and in effect, tell them our lawmaking bodies are made up of a majority of "yellow-bellied mollycoddles," hamstrung by labor hoodlums, so that they cannot or will not think for themselves or the people that they represent.

The American people and I have been fully aware of this ever since the beginning of the excellent exposé of Senator MCCLELLAN'S committee, but it is rather revolting to have to write an American lawmaker and ask him to vote American.

I hope this shoe does not fit you—but if it does, I plant it on your foot as solidly as I know how, and ask you, if you cannot support the administration's labor reform bill, or the Landrum-Griffin bill, then please give your American constituency the common decency of resigning so that they may be honestly represented.

Yours very truly,

It is time for anger, Mr. Speaker, when one of the spokesmen for the union busters frankly states that their objective is to have "all the labor leaders yelling from their cells." Under unanimous consent, I include this letter at this point in my remarks:

Dear MRS. GREEN: I am extremely disappointed with your position on the Landrum-Griffin bill. The bill in my opinion is not strong enough, and until we pass bills that knock some of our labor leaders off their pedestal we are going to continue with the corruption that is plaguing our United States. Unless your position changes you will never receive my vote or the vote of many others I know.

I urge you to pass a bill so strong all the labor leaders will be yelling from their cells.

Sincerely,

_____ _____.

I began by saying I was delighted at the demonstration of righteous indignation displayed by my friend from Ohio—but I wonder if we can get 100 or 75 or even 50 of our Republican colleagues to join us on this side of the aisle in directing some righteous indignation at the mobs of yelling cowards who line up by the hundreds to frighten 9 schoolchildren, or in other towns who return at night under the cover of a grimy sheet and the cloak of darkness to throw bombs at synagogues and schools. I am sure the gentleman will not begrudge me the exercise of some indignation at these betrayals of the public interest.

But where is the evidence of congressional intent to act to stamp out these instances of violence, these attacks upon democracy? Just about 2 weeks ago, I asked if the President intended to plead as eloquently for legislation in the field of civil rights as he had pleaded for punitive labor legislation. I have heard no answer from the President or from his lieutenants in the Congress.

Are we so hypnotized by N.A.M. propaganda that we think violence in the field of labor relations is somehow more objectionable than the violent denial of constitutional rights? Are we so confused by the pressure politics which have been played by the antilabor forces of the country, from the President on down, that we think it is more improper for a union official to dip his hand in the till than it is for a corporation to engage in transparent tax dodges? Mr. Speaker, have the "budget balancers"—who oppose any bill to combat juvenile delinquency—have they persuaded us that violence in a union meeting is a greater threat to the Nation than violence in a juvenile gang war?

Mr. Speaker, during these last several weeks I have joined my colleagues in the committee and on the floor in arguing for a labor-management reform bill. It is needed. And I intend to support the conference committee bill—not because it is perfect. It is not, and there are two main provisions I hope we will change next year.

But the good parts—the necessary parts of the bill far outweigh the bad provisions. And it will at least equip the American people to chase the crooks from one segment of the Nation's economic bloodstream. I sincerely hope, with perhaps more optimism than realism, that the high moral fervor which possessed this House when we were riding down crooks in labor and management, when we were legislating against violence in unions, when we were crusading to protect the secret ballot in unions—I hope, I say, that this high moral fervor will still be present when we turn to civil rights legislation—to legislation to eliminate violence as a mode of race relations, to legislation to guarantee any ballot at all, much less a secret one, to colored Americans in States where they are denied the ballot. I hope the fearlessness which motivated the backers of the Landrum-Griffin bill will be in evidence on this floor when those civil rights bills are before us. I would certainly want to see those rumors about a deal on civil rights put to rest once and for all.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SHELLEY].

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, the battle is over. I do not think there is a Member on this floor who does not know what the vote is going to be. The record has been made. I have made my record and I am ready to stand by it. It is based on conscience and my district. For those of you who have not had the chance to ask me how I am voting, I am here to tell you. On the eve of Labor Day, the day set aside to honor the free American worker, I am not going to join those who stand with a loaded gun at the head of labor and a knife at its heart. I am voting against the adoption of this conference report because I think there are still things in title VII that are inimical and dangerous to the welfare of the working men of this country and, in the long run, dangerous to the welfare of this democracy.

I say to those of you from the North and the West who are inclined to join in the skulduggery that has been perpetrated by those who over the years have fought labor and whose States in a certain area, State after State, have statutory prohibitions and roadblocks against the organizing of people, do not be surprised if you see your industries moving to cheap labor areas where labor organizations will be prevented from organizing the workers.

I think the cat was let out of the bag here on this floor today when a couple of speakers who preceded me said, "This is just the first step." That is all this is, the first step to throttle free labor in this country; and then come in with a national right-to-work law, with the application of antitrust laws to all trade unions, with a prohibition against organizing in public utility fields. And no matter what concessions labor may make, these are the goals of those who do not want free and organized trade unions in this country.

I have made the record. I ask nobody to vote as I vote. But I call some of these things to your attention so you may know what the future holds.

I am against the conference report because I think it is not in the best interests of labor or the country.

Mr. Speaker, the conferees have brought back a report that is not as stringent or as vicious as the Landrum-Griffin bill. Like others I commend all the conferees for their efforts, but I cannot find it in myself to compliment them on the result. Let me make a few specific points of the weaknesses of this report as a law.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that some of the comments made in reference to this bill are more revealing than anything that was said by its advocates during the debate of last month.

Here, and in the other House as well, we have heard the principal supporters of this measure describing it, as I said, as a "first step"—to be followed, in due time, by placing unions under the antitrust laws, by the prohibition of nationwide or companywide bargaining, and so on.

I presume that all these remarks will be duly printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. If they are printed as they were uttered, I can only express my regret that the RECORD does not penetrate into every American household.

Now, at last, the real objectives of the so-called reformers are laid bare Now, at last, they admit that their goal is not the elimination of the crooks, but the destruction of trade unionism.

They are quite right when they call this bill a long step toward that objective. However, they are wrong when they call it a first step. The first step was the Taft-Hartley Act, adopted in 1947. This is a second step in the same direction—the wrong direction for labor and for America.

Mr. Speaker, as the author of a reform bill that this House rejected—the only bill, in my opinion, that punished the guilty instead of the innocent—I want to set before the House a few simple facts.

The first fact, the one that so many of us have forgotten, is that the U.S. Government is committed, by act of Congress, to the encouragement of collective bargaining.

That policy was established in the Wagner Act. It was specifically upheld by Chief Justice Hughes, a Republican, in the Supreme Court decision that declared the Wagner act was constitutional. The same policy is repeated in the preamble to the Taft-Hartley Act.

I challenge the supporters of this bill, and those who speak so bravely of the other measures that will follow it, to state, openly and honestly, their real intentions. I challenge them to seek a reversal of our national policy—to reject the principle that collective bargaining is good for the country.

That's what they believe; and I dare them to say so.

I have no fear, Mr. Speaker, that any of these gentlemen will take up the challenge. They will continue along their established course, paying lip-service to collective bargaining, while they do everything in their power to prevent it.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is one of the steps on that course.

It is a bill replete with sins—sins of commission and sins of omission. And that is why, with all due respect to the conferees of both Houses, I cannot support it.

Let me try, as quickly as possible, to summarize the sins which this bill commits against the honest, legitimate labor movement.

First, it combines with the Taft-Hartley Act to freeze the labor movement at its present size. That is the meaning and the purpose of its restrictions on the right to picket.

Do we in this Congress really believe in that proposition? Do we really want to say to the unorganized workers, "You came along too late—you can't join a union"?

Do we want to say to the labor movement, the organized workers, "You can't have a peaceful picket line to tell the public about nonunion goods"? Do we want to forbid union members from taking a united stand against sweatshops and strikebreakers?

When you take the picketing restrictions in this bill, both as to organization and as to secondary boycotts, that is what we are doing.

We are telling the country that 15 million union members are all that we will allow. We are reversing, by subterfuge, what this House would not dare to reverse by direct action—the right to organize.

Second, this bill makes new rules for the "no man's land," the area which the present National Labor Relations Board refuses to govern.

I suppose it can be said that the bill does not make matters any worse. The "no man's land" was created by the present NLRB. It represents the philosophy of the present administration, that only big companies, and large groups of workers, are worthy of the Government's attention and entitled to the equal protection of the law.

Mr. Speaker, it was the duty of the Congress, and especially of this House, which is closest to the people, to correct the administration's error. Instead of correcting it, we are confirming it. We are relegating many thousands of workers to the conflicting or nonexistent agencies of the 50 States. We are creating a class society within labor, with the dollar sign as a password.

Third—and I am reluctant to try my hand at such a technical point—we are placing union officers in a "fiduciary" relationship to the members. That has a nice, responsible sound to it. The word smells like the inside of a Boston bank, full of tradition and respectability.

But what does it mean? It means that any member can challenge, not the honesty of the union officers, but the wisdom of the membership, with the officers holding the bag.

Let me draw a parallel. Let us suppose that this House voted a loan of $100 million to the Government of France. If we were bound by this bill, the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and—in all likelihood—many others in the executive department could be sued by any citizen, not because the action was illegal, but because in the opinion of one citizen it was unwise.

In such a case the judgment of the courts would be substituted for the judgment of the people's duly elected representatives. This bill would do exactly that in the case of the labor movement.

Mr. Speaker, these are only a few of the iniquities and inequities of this bill, which I am well aware is about to be enacted into law. Rather than continue this recitation, I want to return, very briefly, to the motives of those who have supported its most controversial terms.

The hard core of this group, the ones who made this legislation possible, come from an area of our country which is lowest in average income, lowest in educational standards, lowest in social benefits of all kinds, and lowest in degree of union organization.

I say this, not in criticism of the area or its people, but out of my compassion for them. I think it is tragic that the business leaders in that area, and those who represent them in Congress, are convinced that they can move ahead only by lagging behind; that they can develop the industries they need only by appealing to sweatshops, strikebreakers, and wage cutters.

It is my hope that my friends from the South will see the error of their ways before too many years have passed. In the meantime, however, we as a Nation cannot afford to indulge them in their mistake. We cannot afford to be dragged down to their economic level. Yet this bill is another step in that direction; another triumph of reaction over progress.

To put it another way, this is a cheap labor bill. And cheap labor is bad for those who seek it, bad for the South and bad for the Nation.

I think it is especially unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that we should be adopting this bill on the Labor Day weekend. By our action we are rejecting the meaning of the holiday itself. In a sense, perhaps, we are making this 1959 Labor Day memorable; and I am sure it will endure in history as the low point of our times, the day when an unholy alliance of the National Association of Manufacturers, the chamber of commerce, the Republican Party and the southern defenders of perpetual poverty triumphed over the rights of man.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken today from the heart, out of my deep convictions with regard to this bill. I have left to a later date a legal and technical analysis of its terms. I feel that this occasion was not one for statistics; but I assure you the statistics bear me out, and I shall ask leave to enter them in the RECORD at some future time.

I know it would be fruitless for me to appeal for a vote against this bill. So I will close by predicting with utter confidence, that time will prove my point; and many of those who supported this measure will live to acknowledge their mistake.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be very brief. As one of the House conferees, I prepared a report which was put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD yesterday, and which will be found on page 18021. The report summarizes the settlement of the conferees on important points of difference between the Senate and House bills.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute to, and indicate my profound respect for, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANDRUM]. I pay tribute also to the chairman of our committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] and to the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KEARNS], who have provided outstanding bipartisan leadership to make possible enactment of this legislation.

As one conferee, I pay tribute also to the junior Senator from Massachusetts, Senator KENNEDY, who, as chairman of the conference, presided over the long and difficult sessions with fairness.

I believe that the conference reached an agreement which retains substantially all of the House bill, with but a few modifications and clarifications. I commend the bill agreed upon to my colleagues as a fair and effective bill that will go a long way toward cleaning corruption out of some unions and will help the honest and legitimate unions to grow stronger and to flourish.

In response to a remark made by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHELLEY], I should like to say, as far as I am concerned, as one member of the Committee on Education and Labor, particularly in light of the passage of this bill, that I am definitely against a national right-to-work law. This bill will help rank-and-file union members by guaranteeing freedom and democratic rights which they so desperately need and must have to maintain control of their unions and to run them properly. While I would oppose a national right-to-work law, that is not to say, of course, that there is no need for further legislative study in the labor-management field.

Mr. Speaker, I humbly but earnestly urge my colleagues in the House to vote for this conference report and to pass this bill which will mark a great victory for the American people and for the working men and women of our country.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, my friends in organized labor entertained serious fears as to the provisions of the Landrum-Griffin bill. I believe that many of the causes of their objections have been overcome by the diligent work of the joint conference committee of the House and Senate.

For example, labor was unhappy with the 30-percent membership requirement on organized picketing. I am sure the new provision is an improvement and will not ban their long-established right of informing the public.

I have supported personally the legalizing of prehire agreements in the building industry, so that by adopting the Senate version in this respect the Landrum-Griffin bill has been improved, to my way of thinking. With the on-site picketing legislation which has been promised for early action in the next session, I am told the building trades are satisfied with this section of the report.

Just how much redtape will be required in disclosure of union financial operations I do not know. We can hope the rule of reason will prevail in the administration of the law.

There does not seem to be too much controversy over protection of rights of union members and establishment of democratic procedures. At least, I am assured that only where improper activities and practices exist need there be any serious fears of this compromise bill.

There has been a tremendous public demand for a labor bill. I am always dubious about legislation which is enacted in times of national stress. However, in this case the conferees have included qualifications and exemptions in the harsh boycott and picketing sections, so that I do not think the labor unions will suffer unduly by anti-Hoffa sentiment.

As the best legislation that can be worked out, I support the conference report and urge prompt and favorable action.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like at the outset to pay tribute to my fellow conferees, and to those of the other House for their work on this bill. They labored with great diligence and with the utmost patience under the most difficult circumstances. Not only is this a very complicated bill; but for every one of its complications there were a half dozen different shades of opinion among the committee members.

I say with complete sincerity that this is a far better bill, both technically and in substance, than the one which left this House 2 weeks ago. For this achievement my colleagues deserve the applause of the House and of the American people.

However, Mr. Speaker, even though I recognize the dimensions of the accomplishment, I did not sign the committee report. It is a better bill, but it is still a bad bill. It is still a measure that punishes the innocent for the sins of the guilty. It still aims its heaviest blows, not at the crooks in labor and management, but at the freedom of workers to organize and bargain collectively.

I wish to state that I have supported legislation in committee and on the floor of the House that had all the necessary provisions to eliminate the crooks, racketeers, and goons from the labor movement, but at the same time would have preserved the legitimate rights of trade unions.

The bill which I favored would have prevented the repetition of the wrongdoing which the McClellan committee so diligently illustrated. Let me remind you of some of the provisions which the bill that I supported contained:

It would have guaranteed members rights in unions, assuring them the right to vote and elect union officers, protect them from unfair disciplinary action and would give them a right to sue on union matters in courts.

It would have required full disclosure of union finances. This would have stopped the Becks from dipping their hands in union tills.

Embezzlement of union funds would have been punishable by 5 years in prison.

Criminals would be barred from holding union office until citizenship rights had been restored or for a period of 5 years after they served their jail sentence. This would have kicked out many of the present racketeers who are in union office and would prevent the repetition of unions being taken over by goons and racketeers.

The bill that I supported would have prevented union officers from engaging in businesses which constitute conflict of interest with their duties as representatives of the members in collective bargaining.

This bill would have required secret election of officers. I believe that once a union member would be given an opportunity in racketeer-dominated unions to vote for honest officers, the crooks would be kicked out in the next election. I have consistently supported legislation to correct the intolerable situation that now exists in a few unions.

To digress for a moment, I think it is ironic that we found ourselves in substantial agreement, in principle at least, on virtually every point that actually involved reform. Where we differed was on the application of new and stringent restrictions upon the legitimate functions of legitimate trade unions.

For instance, in this bill we place a 30-day limit on organizational picket lines. We bar any picketing at all for a year after a union has lost a Labor Board election. One would automatically think that the application of this provision would mean what it says and apply equally to all unions. But here is where the so-called no man's land created by the National Labor Relations Board in this administration applies. This no man's land is a typical big-business concept—the concept that some companies and their workers are not entitled to the full protection of the law and the full resources of the Federal Government because they are too unimportant to bother with.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I reject that concept. It is an offense against our moral principles as well as our democratic heritage. On Sundays we may be taught the importance of the sparrow in the field; but on weekdays, under this concept, we are to erect a dollar qualification in the path of workers' rights.

How does this bill resolve the matter? Not, as many of us urged, by insisting upon equal justice for all. No, this bill joins the National Labor Relations Board in casting out this same group of workers, in the forlorn hope that the various States will take care of their needs.

I say that every worker who wants to hold a union card and join in collective bargaining with his employer is entitled to the equal protection of the law, regardless of the size of his company. I am not ready to set up a class society in this country on the basis of the dollar sign.

Any small group of employees seeking to organize, for instance, a business establishment that does under $500,000 worth of business would be subjected to a different set of laws in different States. This will mean that the organizational picketing statute of 30 days would have no application because the Federal law is not applicable. In some States which have strong antilabor legislation, picketing might be stopped in 1 hour without giving the union any chance. In other States with more liberal labor laws, the picketing may continue many months beyond the time provided in the Federal law. We must remember that only 12 out of the 50 States have at the present time a labor relations act and the proper machinery to regulate labor-management disputes. Practically all the other States will resort to the injunction which was quite prevalent before the Norris-La Guardia Act.

The compromise provision to the proposed legislation would allow States to take jurisdiction over all cases over which the National Labor Relations Board refuses to assume jurisdiction. However, the Board will not be able to reduce its jurisdiction even further and the standards that are applicable on August 1, 1959, will remain. In each case the State will be able to apply State law to do the handling of labor-management disputes which are not subject to the National Labor Relations Board. The preferable Senate provision, which would have required the States to apply Federal law even in cases where the National Labor Relations Board ceded jurisdiction, was deleted by the conferees, over my objections. Under the Senate provision the appeal from the State courts could have been taken to the U.S. Supreme Court which would have made it mandatory that the Federal law would be applicable.

Real blackmail picketing aimed at coercing the employer into a payoff or a "sweetheart" contract is covered in another section, which I heartily support. In fact, such picketing is now illegal under both Taft-Hartley and under the Hobbs Act.

During the deliberations in the conference committee, I offered an amendment that would have exempted local unions with less than 200 members from the requirement to file reports. This appears to me a basically fair provision. When it comes to business, we exempt enterprises with less than $300,000 assets from filing SCC reports. But small local unions and lodges with the most limited assets must file detailed financial reports. A few miners in a local union or a handful of railroad workers in a remote station having no paid officials will be imposed upon to file reports which will require a CPA and a lawyer to complete. The small unions, unable to exist, will have to consolidate into large unions. Areawide bargaining will take the place of local bargaining. This is hardly what management wants. It may not be in the public interest. How much thought has been given in the bill to these and related matters?

A number of union officials and a few unions have definitely stepped out of line in their activities with the result that the need for a labor reform bill was obvious. I have consistently supported sound labor reform legislation and will continue to do so. However, I do not feel that true labor reform legislation should contain other punitive provisions. I feel the labor movement as a whole is a great force for good, perhaps the most powerful champion for progress for all the people in our Nation today.

Considering the bill as a whole, I will vote in the negative.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT].

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, after the vote in the other body, it will, of course, be very difficult for those who vote against the conference report not to be accused of being against everything in the conference report. There are some things which, however, I am sure any fair minded person would agree with. On the other hand, I heartily endorse the remarks made by my colleague from California [Mr. SHELLEY]. I think for those of you, if there be any, who have not yet made up your minds, I would like to call specific attention to the no man's land provision, which even my good friend, the gentleman from New Jersey, admits he has reservations about. This is a further extension of section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley law which allows State right-to-work laws. It will provide one standard for the rich unions and another standard for the poor unions. It will create confusion as to the law throughout the land.

I would refer you, also, to pages 27 and 28 of the report as to secondary boycotts and recognition picketing. In my humble opinion, there could be written no language which is more unconstitutional than to deny the right to picket for informational purposes. I sincerely believe, if you read this language, which says you can engage in that kind of picketing so long as it does not induce somebody to prevent others from having access to a plant or company, you will quickly recognize that no organizational picketing in actuality is going to take place in the future in this country.

Let me explain, as briefly as I can, what I mean. The so-called clarifying language that came out of conference is, in my opinion, not a compromise, as is widely hailed, but is actually a semantic bribe. And no better proof exists than in the very language contained in the bill as reported by conference.

In the matter of recognition picketing the language sets forth conditions under which picketing is not permitted. Then a proviso is added that these anti-picketing provisions shall not be construed "to prohibit any picketing or other publicity for the purpose of truthfully advising the public—including consumers—that an employer does not employ members of, or have a contract with, a labor organization." This sounds better than the provisions of the Landrum-Griffin bill as passed by the House. That is, it sounds better until your read on, because the sentence then continues "unless an effect of such picketing is to induce any individual employed by any other person in the course of his employment, not to pick up, deliver, or transport any goods, or not to perform any services."

Now, Mr. Speaker, one does not have to be a lawyer or legal draftsman to see how empty and meaningless this so-called compromise language is. Surely, one can readily see how a primary employer could break such informational picketing. All he would have to do is get a fellow employer, not kindly disposed to trade unions, to instruct his secretary—say—to refuse to deliver a message to the primary employer on the pretext that her service would violate her conviction aroused by the picket line. And there you have it. The picket line would be declared unlawful. Under the provisions of the bill, this informational picketing would have to stop.

We are faced with the same language gimmick—another so-called compromise—regarding the secondary boycott provisions. Secondary boycotts are prohibited with a qualification—a conference achievement, supposedly—that is intended to offset a complete violation of the constitutional right of free speech.

And what is this language gimmick? It is this: the anti-secondary-boycott provisions have presumedly been made more acceptable by adding the language that a union can carry on publicity, "other than picketing, for the purpose of truthfully advising the public, including consumers and members of a labor organization, that a product or products are produced by an employer with whom the labor organization has a primary dispute and are distributed by another employer, as long as such publicity does not have the effect of inducing any individual employed by any person other than the primary employer in the course of his employment to refuse to pick up, deliver, or transport any goods, or not to perform any services, at the establishment of the employer engaged in such distribution."

Here again, Mr. Speaker, the anti-union employer can easily arrange, without much fear of detection for the interruptions of the services belonging to a secondary employer and claimed to be so interrupted as the result of the union publicity campaign. The result would be that a union advertisement would suddenly be in violation of the law.

Singled out for exception to the strict hot cargo provisions are union organizations in the garment and building and construction industries. This is discrimination in reverse. While I am personally pleased to see them taken out from under what I consider highly questionable constitutional provisions, I cannot accept the premise that certain trade union groups—in either good or bad legislation—should be treated apart from the rest of the trade union movement. It is unfair to the trade union movement as a whole. I wish to emphasize a very telling fact that many legal problems lie ahead, not only for labor, but for management. The need to exempt two given trade union groups is the best argument I know to prove this point.

The secondary boycott and recognition picketing provisions play off worker against worker. And I thought this legislation had been championed by its advocates as the savior of the worker. Far from it. It is a bill designed to give employers and employer groups Government-approved tools by which they can dissipate union activity where it already exists and to prevent unionization in the cheap labor areas of the South. This, of course, is to the detriment of unionized industry in other sections of our Nation.

How ironic it is that in this Congress we have heard cries of despair that imports, produced by cheap labor abroad, are threatening domestic industries; but this hue and cry suddenly loses its color and vibrancy when these selfsame facts are turned toward the domestic scene where tariff protection does not apply.

Let us face it. This bill will accelerate the movement of industry from the industrial States of the North, Middle West and West to the low-wage areas of the South.

Mr. Speaker, on August 17 I listed a few of the pertinent reasons why I felt the Landrum-Griffin bill as passed by this body was not a labor management reform measure—which I sincerely sought—but a union-busting measure at its worst and a union-harassment measure at its best. I do not think the Conference Committee has come out with a bill that substantively changes the features I then listed.

I have already discussed "no man's land," secondary boycotts, and hot cargo, and recognition picketing. I think the record should show that other points I made at that time are equally valid today and are further proof that it is misleading to call the conference report a compromise,

First. It still imposes undue expense on the small union in its reporting requirements, and only by having the Secretary of Labor review some 40,000 cases will any of them be granted an exemption. Obviously, few, if any, will be exempted.

Second. It still contains completely inadequate reporting provisions for employers, thus failing to get at the Schefferman-type middleman.

Third. It still contains a bond provision automatically eliminating most of the eligible bonding companies, both within and outside the United States.

Fourth. It eliminates any provision that an employer's unfair labor practice may be used as a defense against a charge of illegal picketing.

Fifth. It fails to grant equal opportunity for membership in, and equal rights within, a labor organization regardless of race, color, or creed.

The right of economic strikers to vote in representation elections presumably reflects a better position than the Landrum-Griffin bill, since it was agreed in conference that such strikers can vote during a period of 1 year after a strike commences. Obviously, it would be to the advantage of a struck employer not to seek an election, following the hiring of strikebreakers, but rather to wait out the year, form a company union with the strikebreakers, and then demand an election which would result in decertification of the union whose members are on strike. Here again, we get an example of the alleged concern for the individual union member. Just another irony.

One final comment I believe is in order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to commend my colleagues, Mr. LANDRUM and Mr. GRIFFIN, for their honest statement in their press release which was issued following the agreement by the conferees. They stated:

> The bill as agreed to by the conferees after 12 days of exhaustive discussion, is basically the Landrum-Griffin bill with a few clarifying amendments.

They also commented:

> The language of the bill agreed upon by the conference follows our original pattern with only minor adjustments.

I heartily commend them for stating it in this direct and honest fashion rather than stating that a compromise had been reached.

With the President's signature assured, I can only hope that those responsible for the administration of this law will act with objectivity, common sense, and understanding of the proper purpose and objectives of the trade union movement. If this is not done, I think that we should go all the way and abolish Labor Day.

Mr. KARTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I yield.

Mr. KARTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KARTH. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of responsibility that I rise in opposition to the conference report on the Landrum-Griffin bill.

I am well aware of the fact that there is need for labor reform that will rid the labor movement of crooks, racketeers, gangsters, and other illegalities. I have introduced a bill that will do this better and more effectively than the bill now before us. It is with my sincere regret that the Rules Committee originally reported a semiclosed rule which allowed but two substitutions. With that rule I supported the Shelley bill and will support it now. The Shelley bill and the Karth bill were nearly identical.

While I support labor reform, I cannot, however, stand idly by and vote for a measure that will slowly but surely annihilate many small businesses and most, if not all, small unions.

There is not one northern legislator, Republican or Democrat, who should support this measure. This bill will kill unions in the South without any doubt. I say as conscientiously as I can and with the utmost of conviction that organization in the South will be stopped dead in its tracks. It is tragic that where the standard of living needs lifting the most, where the economy shamefully drags on the progress of our entire Nation, is where the people are destined to suffer most and fastest. But that is not the purposeful end result. As the South kills the attempts of organized labor to help people shed the dregs of misery, giant industries will move to locate in those areas. Then with cheap labor for the giants let those who cannot afford to move "lock, stock, and barrel" try to compete. Small business and small industry in the North shall die on the vine like a water-starved flower in the desert. The workers of the North will starve along with small industry and small business as the South becomes industrialized.

During this transition period, small unions will be forced to join large international organizations. They will be so forced because of the impossible burdens placed upon them in addition to the legal and technical entanglements that only a lawyer or large, well-versed labor organization could provide. This, then, will in time give the enemies of organized labor great ammunition to propose antitrust legislation which will outlaw international unions. With the large internationals splintered to pieces, and with a situation existing making it impossible for small unions to survive, the end of life may very well come to the labor movement and in all probability will. Senator GOLDWATER has already publicly declared his intentions on union antitrust laws. The stage is set, the die is cast, and the fight for survival begins for small business, small labor, and labor in general as soon as this bill becomes law, if it does.

The Secretary of Labor, Mr. Mitchell, last night said the law will be enforced reasonably and with fairness. I expect this to be true until after the 1960 elections, where, if an anti labor, anti small business or anti small industry Republican administration is elected, the worm would be turned quickly, brutally, and disastrously.

This conference report on Griffin-Landrum bill, as the authors proclaim, even violates the basic fundamentals of freedom of speech.

As time goes on I feel eminently secure with the thought that a "No" vote on this bill will be the one to save posterity.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I feel that this is a most historic day because we—each of us—can say that he or she was a Member of the 86th Congress that had the courage and stability to pass the labor reform bill. I doubt whether many of you realize that we held hearings for months, and it is interesting to know that the conferees were in session for 22 days. I called upon the Library of Congress and asked them to do a little research for me on the length of conference sessions. I find this was the third longest session in the history of the U.S. Congress. The longest was in the 81st Congress on the Army Civil Functions bill. That was a 4-month conference. The next was in 1949 when the conferees on the Executive Reorganization Act were in session for 1 month. Your conferees on this bill sat 22 days, which makes it the third longest in the history of the Congress.

I want to pay particular tribute to the Committee on Labor, to my chairman [Mr. BARDEN], and to every Member on the other side of the aisle, and to the 10 men on my side, and to the sponsors of this bill, Mr. LANDRUM and Mr. GRIFFIN; but beyond that to those who served as conferees, sitting mornings and afternoons, trying to work out a compromise labor bill.

It was not easy, and I know that each and every one of the conferees could stand up and verify what I am going to say: Time and time again we were ready to break up and not have a bill, but then there was that good Member, whether he be Democrat or Republican, that staved off such a situation and we stayed there and worked out a bill. Now, when we go home, and I know we will, a week from tomorrow, we will say that we passed labor reform legislation that the people of this country can live under.

And will it not be wonderful to walk up and down the main street—highways and byways—and say "The Congress of the United States has acted."

And then, Mr. Speaker, I want to pay particular tribute to you. I want to pay tribute to Mr. MCCORMACK, the majority leader; I want to pay tribute to Mr. HALLECK, the minority leader, and to all the others who helped so much. This was a team play for America—this labor bill.

And when we wrap this up with the vote, and I know it will have an overwhelming majority, we can go home and say: "Mr. and Mrs. America, you can live with the labor reform bill of 1959."

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DENT].

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, those of you who are a little in a hurry to vote might reflect somewhat upon history and recall to your minds the stories of the Roman amphitheater when the patricians sat in all their glory and luxury casting the deciding vote on the death or life of the slaves. Let us take our time on this the eve of Labor Day, on this job that is about to be done.

One wonders this day, whether the real meaning of Labor Day has not been completely forgotten during the dying days of this session of Congress.

What can labor be thankful for? Can it be jubilant about the Landrum-Griffin bill?

Can it enjoy the new place it holds in the sun where all of the slander, propaganda, and vicious attacks have put the entire membership of organized labor?

Can it be happy in knowing that when the chips were down, many of their so-called friends turned their backs and slipped the knife blade into labor unity?

Can labor be happy with the dismal record of this Congress with the economic and welfare legislation it failed to pass for the continued economic well-being of the worker and his family?

Can it reflect this Labor Day with joy upon the coming visit of the Boss Communist Khrushchev, and remember still the McCarthy hearings and the condemnation by association even if a labor leader said "Hello" to a Communist?

Can labor wonder why the steelworkers, glassworkers, rubberworkers, and 90 percent of all the unions are treated as stepchildren while a few unions are treated as citizens under the Landrum bill?

If labor wonders today whose Labor Day it is, just let them read this from the chamber of commerce:

> The efforts of groups such as the chamber's governmental affairs committee are beginning to bring results, as shown by forcing House passage of the Landrum-Griffin bill to curb labor.
> This action should be encouragement enough to spur each of us on to do our part to see that the battle is successfully completed.

Labor Day does not belong to free labor this day. The bands and marching feet of long ago are beginning to feel the dead weight of the chains of regimentation and Government control.

A free labor movement and a free enterprise have made this country the envy of the world. Are we now succumbing to the controlled state idea of communism?

The Honorable Ralph Gwinn, longtime Member of Congress and a Republican had this to say recently:

> Communists do not need nor intend to take us over by armed aggression from abroad. They are taking us over from within and with little resistance.
> Communist agents and fellow travelers, who operate our variety of socialism, are now protected in their jobs by civil service, so they continue their subversive influence regardless of which party is in power.
> Congress this year clamors more loudly for more government-owned property and less private freedom. The Supreme Court approves. The President compromises between talk of the free economy and approves more expenditures for socialist measures than did Roosevelt or Truman.
> The American people, brainwashed so long by Communist-influenced publications, radio, TV, movies, etc., do not know what is happening to them.

In my county if I had said that, Harry Pore of the Monessen Daily Independent would have torn me apart in one of his so-called editorials.

His idea of fair legislation for labor is best exemplified by the treatment he gives his political opponents. That means any Democrat who votes for decent treatment for human beings, regardless of their color, race or creed or financial status.

However, this is not an attempt to answer the drivel he prints because long ago, I learned not to get into a squirting contest with a skunk. You cannot win.

However, this Labor Day it is imperative that the people know the truth about the Landrum-Griffin antiworker bill.

Here is what it does—Harry Pore notwithstanding:

First. It stops a union from advertising against nonunion employers by picketing but they can advertise in newspapers, and so forth.

Second. No picketing by any unions except certain craft unions on construction projects. Why are some unions fish, and others fowl?

Third. No union can write contracts which protect its members from handling non-union-made goods even when said goods are made in a plant where the workers are locked out except garment workers and building trades.

This year, 1959, Labor Day, takes on a new and to many a disturbing meaning.

Historically, this day belongs to labor, a period for enumerating gains made by the workers in their long and continuing economic struggle. Most of us only know the conditions that exist in our own area, in our own employment and in some cases, a rough conception of the situation as it obtains in other areas.

Today, in making this report, I want to cover recent actions of Congress as well as some background information in order that you can have some facts that are not well known.

The problem of labor will be multiplied by the passage of legislation such as the Landrum-Griffin bill.

It is not the things that the bill does that makes it so bad, but rather the rules, interpretations, and Court decisions that will follow its passage.

Legislation is often passed because someone wants to gain an advantage over someone else. Sad but true, too much legislation has selfish interest behind its passage.

Buried deep in the Landrum bill is the hidden, but real threat to the economy of the northern and western highly organized industrial States.

Some 25 years ago, as your State Senator, I headed a committee studying the flight of industry from Pennsylvania. We had a serious problem in our textile and hosiery centers because of the exodus from Pennsylvania.

It was found without a reasonable doubt that the move from Pennsylvania was prompted by inducements offered by the Southern States on the basis of low wages and low taxes.

Now we find a great drive by the South to raid the northern industrial centers aided and abetted by the passage of legislation which can make further organization practically impossible.

Who suffers? Our district and our State.

Who benefits? Southern congressional districts and States.

How? By offering to northern manufacturers a low wage nonunion atmosphere for their plants.

As an example of this, let me quote from a letter received by one of our northern manufacturers from the mayor of a city in Mississippi:

> No one will tell you whom you must employ. All detrimental State laws for industrial operations have been repealed. The closed union shop in Mississippi has been outlawed. Industrial wages are from 50 cents to 95 cents an hour below northern States.
> The South has been luring industries from the North by bragging of their tax advantages and free vacant plants and their supply of cheap labor. They want to keep it that way and prevent organized labor from going into the South and raising the living standards, the wages, providing more education for the masses, and improving the general welfare of the citizens of those States. That is their idea of labor reform.
> The Landrum-Griffin bill was passed by a coalition of southern Democrats and northern Republicans. The reason is not too difficult to find when you look at the economic picture. The southerners wanted industry and the northern Republicans wanted a political issue. They both got what they wanted on this score.
> Congressman LANDRUM comes from Georgia. His State is one of the 19 States which have so-called right-to-work laws.
> In Georgia, laws prohibit mass picketing. In Alabama, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas there is no compulsory law for workmen's compensation. Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas have no minimum wage law. Arkansas—the home of the "great friend" of the laboring man Senator MCCLELLAN—has a minimum wage law, it is 16 cents per hour.
> The Landrum-Griffin bill, as passed by the House, will guarantee the continuation of cheap labor and unbelievably poor working conditions for the workers. The northern Republican Congressmen—who voted for the bill—want to see those same conditions and wages exist in our State and all Northern States by stopping all advances on the economic front by working men and women.
> As a matter of information, I present some interesting figures on annual per capita income and the rejections by the armed services of draftees from these States:
> Per capita income for 10 southern right-to-work States for 1958

Alabama	$1,359
Arkansas	1,228
Florida	1,876
Georgia	1,487
Mississippi	1,053
North Carolina	1,384
South Carolina	1,218
Tennessee	1,439
Texas	1,814
Virginia	1,674
Pennsylvania	2,127

> Percentage of draftees disqualified by mental and physical tests for 1957

Alabama	42.6
Arkansas	32.1
Florida	31.3
Georgia	37.0
Mississippi	49.9
North Carolina	32.4
South Carolina	49.8

> Percentage of draftees disqualified by mental and physical tests for 1957—Con.

Tennessee	28.9
Texas	23.1
Pennsylvania	9.5

> The Congressmen from these States almost to a man voted for the Landrum bill. One Member, Congressman ERWIN MITCHELL, from Georgia, elected the same week as I was in a special session, opposed the bill and the threats and abuses he suffered caused him to say that he went through more h—— during the debates on the labor bill than he did as a flier in World War II. It is very significant that little or no notice was taken of this unprecedented pressure by the public press.
> As usual, the people only heard about labor pressure, little was printed about the abusive and thinly veiled threats by the backers of the antilabor bill sent to many Members of Congress.
> Another phase that seems to be lost in the jungle of one-sided propaganda passed out to the people, was the so-called lists of contributions to campaigns by labor organizations. Nothing has been said about the $214,250 contributed to Eisenhower's campaign by chief executives of seven steel companies, led by Armco Steel with $96,450 and closely followed by United States Steel with $26,800.
> The Landrum-Griffin idea is to stop all union contributions to campaigns while allowing contributions from industry sources. You figure out who will benefit from this setup. Will you?
> Too many of our businessmen, professionals, educators, and even newspapers seem to think they have no stake in this type of legislation. They do have and to a much greater degree than what they realize.
> When industry moves, where do they go? Those of us who have watched the closing of the coal mines can remember all too well that without payrolls no one prospers.
> Let us take these same States that are promoting the Landrum-Griffin-type legislation and see what they pay their school teachers as compared to Pennsylvania:

Alabama	$3,350
Arkansas	3,270
Florida	4,980
Georgia	3,625
Mississippi	3,070
North Carolina	3,770
South Carolina	3,305
Tennessee	3,475
Texas	4,410
Virginia	3,900
Pennsylvania	5,000

> Pennsylvania teachers on an average earn up to as much as 60 percent more than these Landrum bill States.
> As a member of the senate for many years I can testify to the struggles and heartaches the teachers had to undergo in our State to get even to the point they now have as salary schedules.
> The teachers' salary bills in Pennsylvania always had the full-fledged support of all organized labor.
> The greatest push for teachers' tenure and job security came from the United Mine Workers and the AFL. There was no CIO in 1935–37.

These same groups pushed through the 4-year extension of the reciprocal trade agreements and now the American worker finds himself faced with an even greater threat than southern wage levels.

Following are just a few examples of foreign wages that they expect Americans to compete against:

Common labor

[Per hour]

	Construction	Iron and steel workers	Bricklayers
Japanese	$0.22	$0.27	$0.28
England	.56	.62	.65
America	2.41	2.97	4.15

Schoolteachers in Europe earn approximately $100 a month.

Is it any mystery, then, that 300 textile plants on the eastern coastline shut down, throwing 345,000 workers out of jobs?

In 1947 we exported $748 million worth of textiles, imported $24 million.

In 1955 we exported $242 million worth of textiles, imported $125 million.

So far this year we are importing more than we are exporting. Japan has had a 3-year embargo against our cars, but is shipping Japanese cars into America every day.

The importation of wire has cost us 11,000 American jobs.

In 1956 foreign cars imported were 107,000, in 1957, 400,000.

In 1956 American-made cars accounted for 57 percent of all cars imported into Brazil.

Today, the Brazilian Government with outside money—mostly from American sources—is building a $600 million plant to make its own cars. We are not opposed to this, but we do not want the cry of "high American wages" being used against American workers at the bargaining table by the very people who are investing in these foreign enterprises.

It is estimated that a large number of our great American enterprises have from 50 to 70 percent of their production overseas.

On this Labor Day we had better stop and reflect on where we have been and where we are going.

The primary consideration of any country is to provide for its own self-preservation. When a nation pursues policies injurious to its own economy, that nation is committing national suicide.

Business reports show Japan booming greater than at any time in its history. West Germany has 100,000 more jobs than job seekers, England has reduced its personal and business taxes three times since World War II.

Billions of dollars of American capital have left this country and have gone into construction of capital equipment in foreign machines which provide job opportunities and economic growth for those countries, but which do not assist the laboring man of this Nation.

When we consider that the wage rates in the United States are generally from 4 to 5 times as high as in England, and over 10 times as high as in Japan, it becomes apparent that, given the know-how and the equipment, foreign labor can produce more cheaply than can American.

It is stupid today to believe that the American laboring man is competing with ignorant, poorly trained and ill-equipped foreigners. We are now competing with people whom we have trained, people whom we have taught the skills which made this country great, and who are working in the most modern of factories which we have built.

We are now beginning to reap the whirlwind we have sown.

We are making the United States the worst place to buy and the best place in the world to sell. If we continue, we will have full employment in Manila and Tokyo and increasing unemployment in Topeka and Detroit.

In this atmosphere was dumped the Landrum-Griffin bill. With this in mind, a Member has to think long and hard and in good conscience, cast his vote for the peoples, for their jobs, their industry, their schools, their roads and parks, their health and welfare, and their public and professional services.

This is Labor Day. All the great men of history have been greater because of their feelings, their sympathy, and compassion for the workers.

This is Labor Day. The organized, the unorganized have all benefited from the struggle of courageous men and women who have led the fights for workman's compensation, overtime pay, social security, paid vacations, limited work hours, welfare and pension plans, hospitalization, and on and on and on.

These are the standards of American workers. These standards must be protected and expanded if this country is to be the leader in the world for peace and prosperity.

Our help, supported by labor, to our needy neighbors, our allies and to the world nations should be for their help not for our destruction.

Labor Day being labor's day, let us give labor a toast not a mickey finn.

The conference report is so full of inequities and personal and private concessions that its passage is a mockery of justice.

How can anyone face the public with anything but shame when he votes for a bill that says to the Clothing and Garment Workers you are a good union, an honest union, you will not hurt the economy or the public or the nonunion employer, so you can write a contract with your employer which forces him to do business with union jobbers only.

Now that is fine for the clothing workers but why should every other union in the country be subject to criminal penalties if they try to write a contract which contains the same protections for their members?

Is this the kind of justice the conferees felt this Congress believes in?

The fact that one of the sponsors of this type of legislation was, according to the newspapers, given this concession to help his garment workers unions does not justify penalizing all other unions.

Another example of special privilege and personal exemption is contained in the building trades concessions.

Mind you fellow Americans, this epic of doubletalk actually writes in a provision giving the building trades an exemption from the hot cargo ban by allowing these unions to make contracts with contractors prohibiting the use of nonunion subcontractors.

This again is fine for the building trades and I am for it, but how can any honest Member of Congress face his rubberworkers, glassworkers, steelworkers, textileworkers, and every other worker in America and say in effect "think the building trades are all good unions, they won't hurt the economy, they won't abuse their rights, but all the rest of the unions will and must therefore be legislated against."

If this is the kind of doubletalk you want, go ahead, but I do not think even a seat in Congress or a favorable editorial is worth this kind of unjust action by Congress.

Another nice gimmick worked out for political expediency and personal advancement is the provision that allows these same unions to make a closed-shop contract which compels an employer to refuse to hire any person who is not a member of a union or who refuses to join the union in 7 days.

This again is fine for these unions, but now you are saying to all the other unions in America with 30,000 locals or more and 12 million workers, if you try to make a closed shop out of your employer's plant, your employer is not permitted to sign such a contract without an election and under no consideration can he agree to force a worker into your union in 7 days, for that matter, 7 years.

In fact, this is the greatest of all giveaways when it comes to showing the utter disregard for equal and decent treatment for all workers that this bill contains.

Again, I would like to congratulate the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GRIFFIN], one of the sponsors, whose brother is the president of a craft union because, unlike many of us with steelworkers, glassworkers, rubberworkers, and so forth, in our families, he can go home without throwing his hat in first.

Any Member of Congress who believes he is voting for legislation that does what the President of the United States, the Secretary of Labor, and those other champions of labor, the chamber of commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers, and humanitarian "I like labor" sponsors say it does by proclaiming it a bill of equal rights for labor "either can't read, won't read, or if they do read it and still believe it to be a fair and equitable piece of legislation, this America is in one awful mess, legislatively."

There has been a great deal of misinformation given to this Congress by the proponents of this legislation who proclaim that under the Taft-Hartley Act labor has grown, yet the facts remain that organized labor, which flourished and grew under the New Deal has actually lost ground in proportion to the population during the past 6 years while its strength has been gravely undermined by numerous rulings of the Eisenhower-appointed National Labor Relations Board. It would be a brave man who could say that organized labor in the United States today has the power it had 6 years ago.

One by one, the broad programs of social advancement upon which the Federal Government embarked during the past 25 years either have been abandoned or where abandonment was impossible, have been weakened.

During the past quarter of a century the American people have built up a considerable number of institutions designed primarily to serve the broadest possible segments of the population.

Many of these people's projects, as they might be called, have been under heavy fire during the past 6 years during the Eisenhower administration and some of them might have been known to take a beating. Public works have suffered, slum clearance and housing, aid, low-income bracket workers have suffered in this regard. There is nothing left but a token program. Even against the repeated warnings, for the past 6 years, that Federal aid for education has become a desperate necessity, low teachers' salaries have caused a dangerous shortage of well-equipped instructors for the Nation's youth.

One by one, these broad programs of social advancement have been chopped away and it will not be too long until the farmers cooperatives feel the sting of this administration's lack of regard for the needs of the little peoples, and although they have been unable to destroy social security, minimum wage, and unemployment compensation which have stood out as the built-in stabilizers against depression, they have strongly ignored the need for refinements and advancements in these programs. One thing can honestly be said that in keeping the Eisenhower administration's policy of choking off public power, weakening labor, holding back social legislation in the fields of health, education, housing, and slum clearance, they have now this infamous, ill-conceived piece of legislation known as the Landrum-Griffin bill. As this administration is searching for a proper token to hand to the Communist dictator Khrushchev when he arrives in this country, I can suggest nothing that would please him more than an embossed copy of the Landrum-Griffin bill. For any Congress that would legislate a so-called bill of rights to think that the inequities, special privileges, and political concessions contained in this piece of legislation cannot honestly believe that the American labor force is a free and unfettered citizenry.

It would be, in one sense of the word, considered ludicrous for a Congress that denies its own Members the right to organize, except at the whim of a few who control the speeding time in the House on subjects of vital and mortal importance to their constituency, and denies to them the right to criticize any Member of the Senate while at the same time putting criminal penalties upon an officer of the union who would deny these same privileges and rights to any member of their organization. One wonders if a knowing American public would approve of legislation such as this if they knew all of the restrictive covenants placed upon the working force of America.

Although it appears as insignificant in this bill, there is a dangerous provision that too many of us who have come through the generation of Hitler, Mussolini, Stalin, and the rest of the dictator type, a denial of the freedom of movement and rights of a member of organized labor who is for the first time subjected to criminal penalties if he discussed with a fellow worker the proposition of refusing to go through a picket line even as a matter of simple conversation in his own home. This, then, is the labor's new Magna Carta, drafted and sponsored, endorsed and promoted by men and organizations who have devoted all of their energies to legislation throughout the years that would restrict, punish, and cripple a free American labor movement. After all of the fuss and fury has subsided, a cold, calculated, and open-minded analysis of the Landrum-Griffin bill must, in all honesty, reach the conclusion that this is a new concept of freedom of speech, freedom of action, and freedom of choice by both the unorganized and the organized workers of this country. In closing, another little noticed item that was put into this legislation by the conferees points up vitally the inequities and inequalities of the special concept of injustice that is being placed around the shoulder of the American worker: When a union is denied the right to advertise with their own homemade placards a nonunion shop or the fact that nonunion and strike goods are being sold or manufactured in a substandard plant or nonunion establishment, but he has all of the rights in the world if he can afford to advertise this fact by paid advertisements in the newspapers.

If this is the type of equality and justice that the Landrum-Griffin proponents feel is all that labor deserves, then I for one, and maybe only one, must protest by my vote. The record shows clearly and vividly and without fear of anything that I have stood foursquare in every proposal just as solidly against the proposals that would eliminate the honest rights of the American workers.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANDRUM].

Mr. LANDRUM. Mr. Speaker, I welcome this moment to acknowledge with grateful thanks all of those who have enthusiastically and effectively supported the position which our distinguished friend, the gentleman from Michigan, and I chose to take in sponsoring this legislation. Likewise, I welcome this moment to express my deep respect and admiration for those who saw fit with equal enthusiasm to oppose our efforts, because it is out of such activity that the real product of American democracy must come.

Now that we have arrived at the best product the conferees could develop from the knowledge of each of the bodies, I beseech all of the Members of this House and all of the citizens of America to provide a wholesome atmosphere in which this legislation can live and work to the betterment of all mankind.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. KASEM].

Mr. KASEM. Mr. Speaker, it has occurred to me that to be sure an injustice was not done a proper approach to the labor problem would have been to put joint restrictions, and the same restrictions, upon labor and management. I thought perhaps I could vote for a bill that would place the same limitation on the delegation of authority to the officers of a corporation that appear in this bill in regard to union officers. I could have perhaps voted for a bill that would place in the hands of administration blessed private bonding companies the right to veto the elected officers of a corporation as is done in this bill with unions. And so on down the line with so many of the injunctions and prohibitions on unions in these bills.

But, in fact, I do not hope for such a bill to come before us, because it would be unfair to corporations in the same manner that this bill is unfair to the labor unions and to its members.

Think along those lines and the day will come that you will see that action will have to be taken or else the organizations that represent not only the people who work for a living, but the organizations who speak, the only major organizations in America, who speak on behalf of the consumer and try to protect him, will be weakened and diminished and they will be forced to turning themselves into political organizations which is the very thing you are trying to prevent.

This bill is deceitfully presented. It does not accomplish what it should accomplish in restricting racketeering. Indeed, it only seems to be incidentally concerned with the problem of racketeering. But no opportunity is lost to burden union organizational and political activity, and this of course, the primary and principal object of this bill. Concurrent and equal restrictions should be imposed on business and management if we are to be fair. I do not advocate restrictions of this nature on business and management. Notwithstanding that the misuse of management positions for personal gain at stockholders expense would make abuses by labor leaders seem trivial, I still believe that the right of management and business to organize capital and to be active politically is of greater importance.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. LIBONATI. Mr. Speaker, the 86th Congress faced an aroused public demand that a strong labor reform law be enacted. The primary purpose was to root out corruption and racketeering. Labor constituents opposed any legislation that curtailed or curbed labor practices, which were always considered in the area of special union rights, such as the secondary boycott—a practice of blacklisting a firm that deals with another firm against which the union has its major dispute—and organizational picketing of a plant in an attempt to compel unionization, though its employees have or are already members of another union.

Both the Senate-approved bill and this House bill would attack union corruption, by requirements for financial reporting to the Government, controls on handling of union funds, and guarantees for secret balloting and free speech, with access to the courts for violations.

The tougher House bill also goes after union practices.

The evidence, from congressional mail and general inquiry, is that the Senate rackets hearings have aroused great interest and concern all across the Nation. The Congressman who wired James R. Hoffa, Teamster president, that he should resign because he was responsible for the drive for strong legislation, was reflected in the basic public appeal of the sponsors appearing on video programs.

The passage of the vigorous, or sometimes called the "killer," Landrum-Griffin bill, by a vote of 303 to 125, resulted from the pressure of public opinion aroused by the McClellan committee hearings, and the broadcasting activities of its personnel. The overwhelming impetus came with the radio-television appeal by the President for its passage. It changed public opinion and created a national demand for a tough labor reform bill.

Passage of strong legislation has been aided by the usual coalition of conservative southerners and Republicans, by a very active White House lobby working among the lawmakers, and by business pressure groups which saw here an opportunity, at long last, to swing the congressional pendulum away from its usual prolabor position.

But of almost equal importance, surely, has been a general public feeling that, somehow and somewhere, the consumer ought to have a larger say and a larger interest in economic affairs. The stalemated steel negotiations cause concern; the previous habit of high wage demands—passed on by management to the consumer—is censured for having spun the spiral of inflation. The suggestion that big unions be made subject to the antitrust laws has been recollected.

The primary demand is to root out corruption and racketeering. The secondary demand derives for other corrective measures—again due to the rackets committee hearings.

This is not typical union behavior. AFL–CIO president, George Meany, has taken strong strides to clean up the unions. The big majority of unions are run by sustantially democratic methods. Congress failed to resist the activities of some employer lobbyists who used today's public concern to turn the clock way back and inhibited even the honest organizational drives of labor where the field is clear.

But the McClellan committee has done its job well. Society is decreeing a closer watch, not only on Teamster Union practices, but on big labor in general, to be sure that it operates within agreed concepts of fair play.

Even though the Landrum-Griffin bill was toned down by the Senate-House conference committee, the final legislation, is highly potent legislation.

It is both unfortunate and fortunate that in a democracy the public mind can be influenced, propagandized or channeled into a demand for legislative action. This frenzied demand for action sometimes results in the adoption of hurried and ill-considered proposals that weaken and destroy the fundamental concepts that have been conceived and adopted after years of study by experienced law-givers who, in their analytical treatment of the subject, have kept uppermost in their minds the total effect upon the whole economy and the welfare and interests of all of the people as a whole. The Taft-Hartley law, in spite of certain criticisms, presented a model study.

It can result in changes that, under more sober conditions, would never have been made. Basic concepts of a problem or program are, in themselves, the very keystone of labor's existence.

In dealing with the interests of those affected by the legislation, certain rights were guarded and protected. But in this instance, labor became the public whipping boy. It was inevitable that, as a result, the measure before us proposes changes that will harass and cripple the labor union movement for years.

The public ordered the reform action and the edict resulted in a victory for the people. A victory that will cost years of unrest in both the political family and the economy.

Neither union leaders nor management—National Association of Manufacturers—are satisfied with the report which the House and Senate conferees have approved.

Some Members of Congress, sitting on a "hot seat", will vote approval only to escape public wrath. The few who will oppose it are representative of laboring areas, and who are honestly apprehensive of the provisions in the bill that could, if enforced, hurt, curb, and sap the future of the labor movement.

The compromise will emasculate the labor movement, and will not permit criminal practices. But it will require—

First. Union and employers to make financial reports;

Second. Union members have a bill of rights, with criminal penalties for violations;

Third. Union elections are regulated;

Fourth. Sweetheart contracts are illegal; and Fifth. "Hot cargo" deals are illegal.

The building trades were excluded from certain provisions of the bill. Their contractual right to enter into contracts with the employer; agreeing not to deal with nonunion subcontractors—also, signing agreements before a job is started, requiring every worker to join a union within seven days. The right to picket a job where a dispute was pending like other industrial unions, was denied.

The garment industry was also excluded from certain restrictive provisions of the bill; that is, secondary boycott or picketing by unions—except where the article was produced by "low wage" production arrangements. These two exclusions may subject these provisions to constitutional attack in the courts as class legislation.

Unions can only advertise against an establishment selling unfair goods. Picket lines are illegal where there is no primary dispute.

The organizing of unions has come under terrific restrictive provisions. It is illegal if picket lines have the effect of interfering with business operations. Bargaining election must be applied for in 30 days—giving little time to organize an effective campaign. Unions cannot resume picketing for a year.

If the election is lost by the unfair practices of the employer, then the NLRB's counsel is instructed not to seek an injunction against picketing; otherwise, if not unfair, proceeds under the Taft-Hartley Act, for decision of the NLRB or the courts.

All disputes involving small business can be decided by State courts or State agencies. The provision authorizing jurisdiction to NLRB regional directors in these matters has given them a more liberal interpretation of powers. The basic rights of unions are destroyed.

It is the history of our country that no important large segment of our society was ever cajoled, harassed or betrayed by unfair laws for very long.

As to the present crisis affecting labor legislation, to be sure the issue was born by the indiscreet action and criminal practices of isolated labor leadership. It was kindled into a devouring flame of public opinion by the enemies and so-called friends of labor. The labor leaders themselves never realized the consuming effects of cleverly manipulated dissemination of public news, on the part of television and commentators. After all, it was news, and certainly created an intriguing interest on the part of millions of listeners. Some may say that a conspiracy was afoot to hamstring labor but an aroused public interest in union affairs certainly cannot be denied.

After all, the public discerns for itself the conditions that negate public good.

The conferees' report is a declaration of rigid reform, so confining in its effect as to labor operation that the movement has suffered a terrific setback, especially in the area of "strikes."

The injunctive relief and jurisdiction vested in State courts on labor questions has always been a sad reminder of the old practices of "yellow" contracts and bold-faced injunctive process of labor control of the unions by biased judges.

The real sufferers will be the Congressmen from balanced districts, especially those who have been elected to office over the years through union influence, regardless of party affiliation.

If labor shows its teeth in embittered political reaction to the forced treatment it has received, there could be a strong bid for a laborite government in the United States, in the near future. The tremendous power in the electorate of the card holders need only be matched with the farmer, England is an example of what can happen to a conservative government.

The interference with union recruiting in unorganized labor groups of industrial workers is an area that touches the sensitive heart core of the labor movement.

The absorption of the smaller unions, under 200 members, is a foregone conclusion. The broad charters of the larger unions cover almost any type of employment.

The die is cast and the struggle is on. Whoever wins will cost the economy of the country more than a hot war.

The American people owe everything to labor that touches upon the raising of the standards of living.

The history of labor bears out the loyalty of her leaders, as well as the rank and file, to the highest of patriotic motives. It would have been far better to permit labor to purge her own shortcomings. There was no need for new laws on crime. Labor departures are no different from those punished under specific State and Federal statutes. The enemies of labor have drawn first blood and the splatter of it will eventually cover the political front.

Although certain provisions of the bill are contributory to the realization of the purpose of the legislation, I cannot in good conscience support legislation that straps labor in its efforts to organize working men and women into a unit of labor to bargain for better working conditions. They are a valuable asset to contribute to the public well-being. For a complete realization of their purposes, they must not be interfered with or constrained by Government control. It reads, plain as day, that if the Government becomes too involved in union business, unions will make the Government's business their business. Either condition is not good for the continuance of good political relations. Labor or Government cannot survive in this struggle. One is needed to support the other. Both must be free to pursue their own affairs and work together to keep the economy and Nation strong.

Labor did not deserve subjection to a slow death by partial strangulation. The hot-cargo and picketing bans insure its demise by confinement.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks, I include the following exchange of letters:

AUGUST 18, 1959.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Only you know, in the privacy of your own conscience, whether you carefully considered the possible consequences of the Landrum-Griffin bill when you voted for it on August 13, 1959. If you did, and realized that it is a punitive, repressive measure intended to weaken all labor unions and thereby all working men and women, you have much to answer for. If you did not, and merely yielded to the pressures of the chamber of commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers, your guilt is perhaps even greater.

You should realize now, if you did not during the heat of battle, that this vindictive assault on the labor movement will, in the long run, prove to your constituents that you are less interested in individual rights and democracy than in property rights and the concentration of power in the hands of big business.

You may believe that you are safe in such action because organized labor is relatively weak in your district, and cannot call you to account for the damage you have sought to do to it. You may be right—at the moment.

We wish to assure you, however, that we shall do all in our power to prove to the working men and women in your district that you have cast your lot against them and they should therefore take appropriate action at the ballot box.

Very truly yours,

JAMES B. CAREY,
President.

AUGUST 21, 1959.

DEAR MR. CAREY: In reply to your letter of August 18, I wish to remind you that the American people have once again proven they are the masters of their own destiny. Such threats as yours are most unfair to all the millions of hard-working, patriotic rank and file union members—nor do your threats impress or scare any servant of the people who is not bought and paid for by union boss racketeers.

Truly,

BEN F. JENSEN.

Mr. Speaker, the above exchange of letters followed a few days after the House of Representatives had voted on the Landrum-Griffin labor reform bill last month when 95 southern patriots joined with 134 Republicans to pass this important and vital piece of legislation.

Insofar as party responsibility is concerned I would prefer that there were always enough Republicans in the national legislature to keep some sanity in our lawmaking. However I must confess that it is comforting to have that solid corps of a hundred or so conservative votes from Dixie to count on as we try to enact legislation which is beneficial to all America.

Here are a few excerpts from a speech I made in the House of Representatives last January 9:

Mr. Speaker, the time has come to speak plainly. Many members who had the contracted support of Reuther's so-called liberal labor party were elected last November and, of course, they are expected to blindly follow orders from the organization which contributed greatly to their campaign, since they are bought and paid for.

Democrats and Republicans are hoping—yes, praying—that Congress will hold the line against those who for selfish reasons are bringing concerted pressure on us to follow their anti-American liberal concepts. Every well informed, unbiased, American citizen knows that the true definition of a "modern Reuther liberal" is one who is primarily liberal with our constitutional rights and with our taxpayers' dollar.

May God give us courage and strength to meet the test, with the outspoken support of courageous men and women here in Congress and all over our broad land.

On this the opening of the 86th Congress, I felt it in my heart to give expression—as I have here—to my innermost feelings, to be printed in the RECORD, that thousands, yea millions, might read and then do their part, and more, to preserve our precious American liberties.

I am now proud and happy to say that courageous men and women from every section of our broad land did speak up in great numbers and in no uncertain terms to again prove that the people are the masters of their own destiny.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, my absence from Washington as an official delegate of the U.S. Congress to the Interparliamentary Union Conference in Warsaw, Poland, has precluded my being able to vote on the conference report on the labor reform bill. However, I certainly want to have my position recorded on this important vote.

Labor legislation must provide the workingman, in his capacity as a dues-paying union member, with a full bill of rights, insuring the right to freedom of speech and assembly, protection from arbitrary dues, protection of rights in court and safeguards against improper disciplinary action. It must preserve the right of members to receive a true financial accounting of the activities of their union. It must protect the public from abuses exposed by the McClellan committee, while at the same time preserving the rights of legitimate unions.

Mr. Speaker, if the conference report on the labor reform bills embodies these principles, if present I would vote, "yea."

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, the legislation before us today has been designed to meet the overwhelming demand of the American people to eliminate the kind of racketeering in the labor movement, conducted at the expense of rank and file members of unions, which has been uncovered over the past several years by investigations of the McClellan committee. While there is certainly a need to provide appropriate laws to see that this kind of racketeering is eliminated and that individuals like Jimmy Hoffa who believe they can put themselves above the law are effectively prevented from carrying on the kind of activities disclosed by the committee, I believe the American people also feel that such legislation should not penalize the overwhelming majority of unions and union members who are loyal, law-abiding, American citizens and who are sincerely and properly devoted to their legitimate function of improving the wages and working conditions of their members.

Throughout the long months that this complex subject has been under consideration by the 86th Congress, those have been the two major considerations which I have kept in mind, and I believe in so doing I am reflecting the views of the overwhelming majority of the people of my district, whether they are themselves members of union organizations or not.

When the subject of labor-management reform legislation finally came before the House last month for consideration I indicated my support for the bill officially voted out by a majority of the members of the House Education and Labor Committee, the so-called Elliott bill. I supported this bill because it had been thoroughly studied and examined in the committee and also because it seemed to me to deal with the more flagrant issues that had been uncovered by the McClellan committee without at the same time impinging on the legitimate activities of the great majority of fair and decent union organizations. When the basic issue arose on August 13 in the House of replacing this carefully considered bill, which closely resembled legislation previously adopted by a 90-to-1 vote in the U.S. Senate, with a bill only recently introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANDRUM] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GRIFFIN] I voted against the Landrum-Griffin substitute. When the House, in spite of my vote, decided 229 to 201 to substitute the Landrum-Griffin bill I then stated that although there were many features of the Landrum-Griffin bill which I opposed as being unfair and unnecessarily harsh toward legitimate union activity, I would nevertheless vote in favor of final passage of this bill and send it to conference with the Senate rather than vote for no labor legislation at all. I said at that time that I felt it was important that a fair and effective labor reform bill be enacted into law by Congress this year, and I also said that if such a bill were not enacted into law this year there was the strong possibility that legislation which would more drastically upset normal labor-management relations might be enacted into law next year.

I therefore voted in favor of sending the Landrum-Griffin bill to conference with the express understanding, as I said in the RECORD at the time, "That my vote does not constitute approval of many of the provisions of the Landrum-Griffin bill." I then continued, "I am hopeful that as a result of the conference a fairer bill can be worked out which will still root out the Hoffas and the racketeers in the labor movement without penalizing legitimate union organizations. I voted to send the bill to conference also with the understanding that I will definitely reserve my final vote until I have a chance to see whether the conference committee agrees to a better and fairer bill, more nearly in line with either the bill which was reported out by the House committee or the Kennedy-Ervin bill which passed the Senate earlier this year."

Mr. Speaker, I have now studied the conference report carefully since the time it was submitted the other evening and I have been very greatly impressed with the work which the conferees have done. I think it is quite clear to say, as has already been said, that the bill agreed to by all but 2 of the 14 conferees is "infinitely better" than the Landrum-Griffin bill sent by the House to conference. As has already been mentioned on this floor this afternoon, the conference bill represents about 95 percent of the original Elliott bill reported out of the House Committee, the bill which I originally strongly supported as being a fair, middle-of-the-road approach to this complex legislative problem.

I am frank to say that I do not feel happy about every single provision in the conference bill. The thing that concerned me most about the Landrum-Griffin bill was that it would make it extremely difficult if not impossible for normal and legitimate labor organization activities to be carried on in the Southern States of our country, and this fact would perpetuate the unfortunate cost differential between the States of the South and the more progressive and highly developed industrial States of the North; and as a result of this continuing differential the serious and steady flow of industry from the North to the South could be expected to continue, with even greater and more disastrous results in terms of unemployment in my State and in my district.

I am still not completely satisfied, for example, with the solution to the "no man's land" problem in the conference report, although this is a considerable improvement over the solution contained in the original Landrum-Griffin bill. It still seems to me proper in setting up a national law to govern labor-management relations, as we are doing here, that we should require that all administration of this law be in line with the provisions of the law itself. It just does not make sense to me to turn over these matters to State agencies, especially when 35 of our 50 States have no labor agency at all, and then to say that these States are not required to follow the provisions of the same Federal law which gives them jurisdiction.

But no one can probably ever be completely satisfied with any piece of legislation, and compromise is of course the essence of the legislative process. One of the things about the Landrum-Griffin bill which particularly disturbed me was the provision which would have made organizational picketing completely impossible and in practice might possibly have prevented all effective labor organization in the South. This requirement has now been eliminated as a result of the conference and I believe the solution which has been worked out, which is virtually the same solution as contained in the original Elliott bill, will now make possible proper and legitimate organizational activities by decent unions.

We have seen the conferees come up with a remarkable example of compromise and adjustment, a bill which I believe will protect union members and legitimate union activity in the overwhelming percentage of the cases and at the same time eliminate the kind of unwholesome racketeering which has come from a small minority of the labor movement and has created the public demand for this action.

Mr. Speaker, as one who represents a district which has been severely hit by foreign competition and who has spoken out on this side of the aisle in the House for promoting strict adherence to the Buy American law and in behalf of efforts to tighten that law to protect American wage standards against low-wage competition from abroad, I was particularly happy to see in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for September 3 in the account of the debate on the conference report which appeared in the other body the statements by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] that the decision of the conference report would have no effect in "limiting or prohibiting the various Buy America campaigns which are now being carried on by certain unions and business groups and even by some governmental bodies." Both Members of the other body made it clear that legislation in the conference report was not intended to interfere with these proper and laudable campaigns to protect our American standards, and I am happy indeed to see that the legislative history has now been made clear on this point. I make these comments today so that the legislative history in this body may also be just as clear on this important point.

Mr. Speaker, let us not forget as we pass this legislation on the eve of Labor Day, that labor union organizations and the working men and women of America have made a tremendous contribution to the development of our country and to the development and protection of the high living standards under which we all live. This free labor movement of ours can and must continue because it is a part of the great American tradition of freedom. It will now be up to those who administer this new law to make sure that nothing contained herein will set back the clock of progress or the great effort to improve the living standards of the working men and women of America through free, legitimate, and proper union activity. I believe that every Member of this body will be watching with careful interest the practical application of this law and I hope that we will be just as eager and just as prompt in perfecting and improving it in years to come in the light of experience as we have been in adopting it this year.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, as one who, like many others in the House, was very concerned with some of the provisions of the labor-management reform bill that passed this body, I am pleased to see that some of the apparent inequities have been corrected in the Senate-House conference. I expressed my concern in this respect pointing to specific provisions in an individually written appeal to the conferees during their deliberation.

I am particularly impressed with the revision of the secondary boycott section which excludes from the application of the new coercion-of-employers clause, the garment industry.

I am very interested in this industry and I am a stanch admirer of the vast strides made in it through collective bargaining and, the great alleviation of sweatshops and substandard working conditions that the garment workers unions have accomplished.

That is why I wish to particularly commend the conferees for their decision to remove that industry from the application of the new section 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Of all the industries in the Nation the garment industry was one of the most susceptible to employer evasions of agreements. It was particularly difficult for unions to police competition from sweat shops because employers hired jobs out to hidden lofts and received back the finished product before the unions could catch up with them. By the time they did, a jobber might already have given another lot to a different sweat shop.

Consequently, low wages and terrible working conditions at one time characterized the industry. But the garment workers unions and responsible employers came to learn that the practice could be checked only if manufacturers would agree not to do business with contractors who had not signed union contracts.

Inhuman working conditions for most garment employees were immeasurably alleviated. This magnificent accomplishment reflects great credit on the unions and on fairminded employers.

Unfortunately, the House version of the bill as originally introduced, would have imperiled this fine achievement. It would have made it unlawful for a union to threaten, coerce or restrain any employer where the object was to force such employer to agree to cease doing business with any other person. Such a provision would have wiped out at one stroke the gains registered in the garment industry.

Therefore, the conference report language exempting the garment industry from the interdiction against coercing an employer from handling the products of another or from doing business with another is a welcome one indeed. The garment unions can continue to make agreements with jobbers not to contract out work to subcontractors using nonunion labor.

Commendable as this correction is, Mr. Speaker, there are other provisions about which I am still concerned. In this regard I agree with Senator KENNEDY that the bill goes further in some areas than I think desirable or necessary. But, this is the only bill it is possible to obtain under all the circumstances.

I will keep a close watch on how the new legislation works and will press for any necessary amendments to correct injustices so that reasonable law for the protection and benefit of all Americans will eventuate.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the conference report which we are now to vote upon substantially adopts the Kennedy-Elliott bill and certainly supports the position of such bill against both extremes. Dr. Archibald Cox has worked with this legislation more than any other person. He has been an adviser to the Senate committee and the conferees and is one of the foremost labor law authorities. He proclaims that the bill is closer to the Kennedy-Elliott bill than any other bill, and, of course, that bill was patterned after the original Kennedy-Ives bill. So we can see that most of the demagogery that was thrown into this matter during the past 2 years by both extremes has been largely separated and eliminated in the final product.

I do hope that reflection upon the diverting, unreasonable, inappropriate activities and actions of extremists will help prevent stampeding in the legislative process in the future. Reflection upon this whole process and activity certainly strengthens the arguments against a unicameral National Legislature where legislation adopted under feverish, intemperate conditions would become law without an adequate opportunity for review.

I do still have some serious reservations concerning this bill and especially with regard to leaving so many businesses and their employees without the protection and service of the National Labor Relations Board. These businesses and employees which were in no man's land are discriminated against; but, they also are being discriminated against at the present time. I am glad that the committee is agreed that this matter needs to be watched closely. The conference report does greatly improve the Landrum bill provisions on no man's land by prohibiting the NLRB from withdrawing its protection and service from any additional classes or categories of businesses and employees.

There are a couple of provisions that undoubtedly will become subject to court suits as unconstitutional and probably upheld; but, in a bill of this size, that is not too uncommon and those court actions will eventually result in improving and contributing to the body of labor law.

There are also some provisions in the bill which correct inequities against working people that have been recognized and recommended for several years.

With 437 Members in the House, no Member can expect a bill to be exactly what he would prefer. One must vote either "yes" or "no" and cannot vote "yes, with certain amendments."

I, like the majority of Members, want a law passed that will provide corrective but not "killer" legislation; and I believe this bill is the best that can be expected at this time.

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, the compromise judgment of the House and Senate conferees, on the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, is finally before us and, although many of us here may still have conscientious doubts about the extreme nature of a few provisions, it is now, on the whole, worthy of the acceptance of this House.

After many days and nights of laborious, painstaking, and wearisome discussions, the members of the conference committee, with patriotic dedication have overwhelmingly approved a modified bill representing concessions by reasonable men on both sides.

The compromise solution that was developed is, in my opinion, a vindication of those of us who consistently from the beginning worked and voted toward this objective.

In all the understandable excitement that has surrounded this legislative problem this year, it seems to have been rather widely forgotten that this controversy was considered in the last 85th Congress, of which I was privileged to be a Member. I would like to remind you that the Senate, on June 17, 1958, passed by a vote of 88 to 2, S. 3974 of the 85th Congress, the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1958. On July 23, 1958, as the 85th Congress was approaching its end, I urged the leadership to take appropriate action for "this labor-management reform bill to be presented to the House before adjournment so that it may be discussed, debated, and acted upon in accord with our democratic legislative traditions." Further, in the course of my remarks on that day, I stated that—

> As conscientious legislators it is our duty to closely examine these pressures (from labor and management) and concentrate our attention upon the enactment of a reasonable compromise designed primarily to inspire observance of the law with good will because of its essentially important nature.

Mr. Speaker, in response to the urging of myself and many other colleagues, S. 3974 was presented to this House, under suspension of the rules, on August 18, 1958. Mr. Speaker, I, and 197 other Members, voted in favor of the measure, but it failed of passage because of the two-thirds requirement.

In my judgment, if the passage of that bill had not been blocked by a partisan coalition, for dubious purposes, we would have had, then and there, a reasonable law to effectively curb unscrupulous individuals and eliminate corrupt practices revealed by the Senate investigating committee. The passions and the prejudices leading to the bitter and extreme controversy that has recently occurred here over this matter would have been avoided in the national interest and the vitally important economic area of labor-management relations would be much healthier today.

As we are all only too well aware, the extremists of both labor and management, with their advocates, set the tragic stage for a fatiguing legislative battle in both Chambers of this Congress. At the end of that unhappy struggle, it appears that despite the patriotic spirit of the compromising efforts of over 200 Members here a measure of too punitive impact upon the legitimate activities of labor and management had been approved by the slight margin of 28 votes. Ironically, it seemed that those who cried the loudest for the protection of the public had unwittingly constructed a legislative provocation for labor and management to become embroiled in the most bitter and divisive struggle in our history; a struggle that could shake the foundations of our economic stability into a disastrous shambles at the most crucial period of our national life and on the eve of the visitation of the leader of our Communist enemy to this city.

Ironically some of these same extremists, who spoke, not too long ago, in such eloquent reverence of the late coauthor of the Taft-Hartley Act seem to have completely forgotten that that great patriot and statesman, Senator Robert A. Taft, had publicly admitted and openly proclaimed his intention of seeking the modification of certain provisions of his own law; the same provisions that they were perseveringly determined would not be changed in any fashion whatsoever. In memory of that good and dedicated man, we are impelled to ask ourselves—how fleeting is fame and how unmindful we can be of recognized authority and wisdom.

Mr. Speaker, fortunately for this Nation, the calm, temperate efforts of the reasonable men on the conference committee have worked out a modified measure under the most trying circumstances that can challenge any patriotic legislative group. The compromise judgment that has been developed is the fullest legislative response that can be obtained to the public demand for reform in current labor-management activities.

Mr. Speaker, over the 2 years of this controversy I have consistently and publicly stated my desire and objective to be the enactment of the most reasonable legislation possible to constrain effectively the "crooks and gangsters" and eliminate the unscruplous practices, as revealed by the Senate Investigating Committee, from and within the area of labor-management activities, while at the same time protecting and preserving their legitimate operations in our economic society. The most acceptable approach to this objective, in reply to the public demand, is now before us in the form of the final legislative conscience of the U.S. Congress. Let us each, in accord with our patriotic principles, heed the voice of that conscience.

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that Congress will soon pass a labor law. I shall wholeheartedly vote for its passage. It is not the bill which I would have written myself, nor do I agree with its provisions in every regard, although in many respects the conference has improved the separate versions of the House and Senate. Nevertheless, I feel that it is vital for the Congress to pass an adequate law at this session to satisfy the demand of the American people for firm action to curb abuses in the labor movement. With the bill which the conference has presented, I believe that we shall satisfy this demand.

This law will have no effect upon the growth of the American labor movement, but it will give an added protection to individual members against unscrupulous leaders.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am going to support the conference report on the labor-management reform bill before us. The American people and the great majority of my constituents in the Second Congressional District of Massachusetts have demanded that a reform bill be passed in this session of Congress after witnessing the shocking and sickening revelations of the McClellan committee during the last 2½ years.

I said before when this issue was before the House that the abuses revealed by the McClellan Committee must be stopped and we must enact legislation that will put an end to the thugs, the goons, and embezzlers who have been nefariously engaged in bilking the rank and file of American labor, cheating and defrauding the labor unions, management, and the general public.

Mr. Speaker, I will vote for the bill because I am sure that it will correct these abuses. It is the only bill that is possible to obtain this late in the session of Congress. The conferees lead by my Massachusetts colleague, Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY, are to be complimented for the long hours during which they labored for 12 days arriving at this compromise, which, Senator KENNEDY has explained, will protect the traditional and essential rights of the working people of America legitimately striving to improve conditions of employment.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the conference report on S. 1555, the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, because it contains provisions which I believe will prove extremely harmful to the legitimate procedures of labor organizations.

I also fear that it will prove to be an industry dispersion bill, providing inducements never anticipated to lure industry from the organized labor areas concentrated in the large industrial cities of the North.

The Southern States will press their claim with new vigor in luring northern industry with low-cost labor.

The provisions which permit the States to assume jurisdiction in the so-called no man's land in labor disputes are invitations for the States to guarantee industry statutory immunity from effective labor organizational activity. Thirty-five States have no adequate labor laws. They will endeavor to outbid each other for the reputation of having the most severe antilabor laws and the most favorable atmosphere for industry.

The failure of the conference report to provide that the State courts and agencies would administer the Federal law constitutes, in my opinion, its most patent failure.

Organizational picketing gave labor its most useful organizational tool and resulted in the success of the labor movement throughout the North. The limitation on organizational picketing in the conference report will result in further discriminaton against efforts to organize labor where it is not presently organized—a further advantage to the low-cost labor areas.

It is my considered judgment that this bill, ostensibly created to eliminate and curb labor corruption, will prove to widen the schism between management and the overwhelming number of legitimate labor unions.

Instead of creating an atmosphere of balance and understanding between these vital segments of our economy, it may well prod them toward opposite goals. Conflicts between labor and management could be encouraged. Strikes and lockouts could become more common. The productive and prosperity goals of the Nation could suffer.

Management has newly gained powers under this bill which it may use selfishly or with wisdom. It is my hope that it will exercise puntive powers with greater restraint than past history indicates. With this legislation, management has scored a great victory. It will prove only temporary unless its added discretion is temporized with humane understanding.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, the major provisions of this bill now before us in the form of a conference report has been debated at great length and carefully scrutinized in conference. It is important, however, to determine the intent of the Congress in those areas which have not been spelled out in detail so that the legislative history will be clear.

As you know, our Government has instituted a policy of buy American. Management and labor throughout our country have also adopted campaigns, in various forms, to implement and augment the Federal laws on this subject to protect the capital investment and jobs of our people. I was pleased to note that on yesterday, in a colloquy in the other body, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], agreed that this conference report in no way was intended to interfere with such practices. This was certainly my understanding of the report recognizing, as I do, the fine efforts of many industries including the hat, shoe, and textile industries, to maintain American standards in the face of substandard wages abroad.

In brief, there was nothing in the Taft-Hartley Act, nor is there anything in this new labor reform act, which impairs or diminishes in the slightest degree the right of employers and their associations or employees or unions to seek to protect the job security and labor standards from the competition of foreign-made goods imported into this country. As American citizens, they have the right to conduct campaigns such as are now being conducted throughout the country, to promote the sale of American-made products. They have the right to seek and to secure agreements in which promises are given to buy American goods. For example, a union may carry on a campaign to protect the labor standards of American workers from being undermined by the competition of goods which are made behind the Iron Curtain or in any other foreign country and may secure and enforce agreements with employers, wholesalers, and retailers to buy American-made products only. Nothing in this bill prohibits such campaigns nor prohibits the enforcement of such agreements reached thereby by court action, arbitration, or the traditional means of unions to enforce any other type of agreement.

I support this bill and urge its adoption.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, even if there were no other reasons for me to vote against the pending conference report on the so-called labor-reform bill, I would vote against it solely because of the economic discriminations and disadvantages which are certain to develop against the economy of Maine and New England as a result of the "no man's land" area of labor-management disputes jurisdiction.

The economic advantages which are guaranteed to the Southern States by the provisions of the conference report have been covered in detail by several of my colleagues. The "pirating" of the New England textile industry by the Southern States, over the past several years, has been accomplished by reason of the low-wage levels and lack of statutory and collective-bargaining requirements for decent working conditions in these States. Naturally, there has been almost unanimous support by Southern Congressmen for the punitive and restrictive labor-organizational provisions of the Landrum-Griffin proposal and its 90-percent acceptance by the House and Senate conferees. Wage levels and working conditions cannot be improved without strong, aggressive union organization in the South. This conference report nails down, by congressional fiat, the economic advantages of the South over the northern industrial States. In short, this Landrum-Griffin conference report is a legislative license to procure northern industry and jobs. Does any industrial manager in Maine think for 1 minute that any State where there is a State minimum wage law of 16 cents per hour, is ever going to increase that minimum to Maine's $1 per hour requirement, as long as NLRB denied jurisdiction over labor disputes and proceedings is taken over by the State courts of that State? Do any of the industrial managers of Maine or the members of the chambers of commerce of our communities, who have pressured me to vote for the Landrum-Griffin shackles for labor organizations, think for 1 minute that States where there are no compulsory laws for workmen's compensation, are going to be forced to adopt such 20th century protection for labor unless and until strong and aggressive labor organizations force the issue?

I would expect, Mr. Speaker, that every businessman in Maine, who applied the pressure on me to vote to curtail the organizing activities of unions, has on many occasions, expressed his opposition to the low wage levels and substandard working conditions of the South and yet these same leaders of industry in my State condemn me for voting against legislation which will perpetuate these unfair and substandard advantages which have so effectively undermined the Maine economy. Certainly, I was not elected to Congress to liquidate further our already diluted Maine industry and the sadly decreased number of jobs which it provides.

It is my sincere conviction that a vote for the Landrum-Griffin conference report was a vote to speed the flight of industry from the North to the largely unorganized South. Maine and New England industry will really get the "sales pitch" now to move into not only the unorganized, but also, the never-to-be-organized South.

Another strongly motivating factor in my vote against the Landrum-Griffin conference report was the open invitation for the powerful unions of the Nation to take over the small, struggling unions. Under the terms of this conference agreement, only the well-entrenched international unions with great assets and legal talent will be able to meet the legal delays, the legalistic entanglements and the slanted anti-labor decisions of State courts, operating under State statutes and decisions. This, in turn, means that small unions who cannot afford to fight against these handicaps will be absorbed by the big unions which have caused the people of America, who have been getting this anti-labor brainwashing over the past several years, to demand so-called reform legislation. The Landrum-Griffin conference report is not corrective—it is punitive and destructive of legitimate union activities.

Another inevitable result, in my opinion, of the adoption of this Landrum-Griffin conference report, will be encouragement and opportunity for racketeers and crooks to take over official leadership of small unions. Dedicated, honest union leaders, confronted with almost impossible duties of mandatory detailed financial reports and faced with criminal penalties, if found in violation of the so-called bill of rights of union membership, will refuse to expose themselves to the abuse of stooges, agitators, Communists, drunks and hired wreckers of their union organizations. They will resign and the type of leadership which the exposures of the McClellan committee publicized to the Nation will take over in increasing numbers. This probability is not good for anybody in America, for it is not good for the working men and women of America.

As I see the picture, Mr. Speaker, the adoption of this Landrum-Griffin conference report leads in only one direction. It is just one more step toward more restrictive labor legislation. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Manufacturers Association, speaking and acting for big business with their appetites for further labor control whetted by this victory, will press for the ultimate victory; namely, a national so-called right-to-work law and then, the antitrust stranglehold for which they are really aiming. Many of them have already so stated. The program of big business in America is not only to control financially and economically, but also politically. Strong labor unions now stand in the way of their objective just as America and the free world stands in the way of Khrushchev and his totalitarian power.

The Taft-Hartley law, and its mal-administration for these past 6½ years, by the National Labor Relations Board, through its big business-administration appointees, has served as a brake to slow down the growth of labor organizations, which otherwise, today, would have numbered far more than the now organized 18 million of the total 67 million working men and women of America. If Taft-Hartley had not replaced the real magna carta of labor, the Wagner Labor Relations Act of the depression days, organized labor would have been far more effective in gaining equalization with the power of big business and accordingly would have been far more effective in the Congress. The Landrum-Griffin conference report will not only slow down further the growth and strength of the trade-union movement, but it will eventually lead to the more repressive developments to which I have referred; namely, the so-called right-to-work laws on a national scale and then, the crowning blow, the antitrust knockout punch. This will mean the breakdown of American democracy.

As long as I am a Member of this House, Mr. Speaker, my vote will never be recorded for legislation which makes illegal the economic weapons which the working men and women need, to fight for and get their fair share of the production of this great productive plant which is known as industrial America.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to and shall vote against this Landrum-Griffin conference report.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss in detail the provisions of the conference report, a few brief comments on several sections of the bill might be helpful in clarifying legislative intent.

Section 101(a)(4) of the bill of rights is designed to protect the right of a union member to resort to courts and administrative agencies. The proviso which limits exhaustion of internal remedies is not intended to impose restrictions on a union member which do not otherwise exist, but rather to place a maximum on the length of time which may be required to exhaust such remedies. In other words, existing decisions which require, or do not require, exhaustion of such remedies are not to be affected except as a time limit of 4 months is superimposed. Also, by use of the phrase "reasonable hearing procedures" in the proviso, it should be clear that no obligation is imposed to exhaust procedures where it would obviously be futile or would place an undue burden on the union member.

Furthermore, the proviso was not intended to limit in any way the right of a union member under the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, as amended, to file unfair labor practice charges against a union, or the right of the NLRB to entertain such charges, even though a 4-month period may not have elapsed.

The last proviso in section 101(a)(4) was added to make sure that interested employers do not take advantage of rights accorded union members by encouraging or financing harassing suits or proceedings brought by union members against their unions. The purpose of the proviso should be kept in mind and it should not be so narrowly construed as to impose unnecessary or unintended restrictions upon employers in their relationship with their employees. For example, the language does not prevent, and there is no intent to preclude, an employer from encouraging his employees to write or otherwise communicate with their Congressman or legislators concerning legislation.

Section 201(d) repeals the reporting and non-Communist affidavit filing obligations of section 9 (f), (g), and (h) of the Taft-Hartley Act. This provision will become effective upon enactment of the bill. However, the repeal of these sections does not have a retroactive effect and is not intended to excuse any previous failure to comply therewith.

Section 701(b) authorizes the National Labor Relations Board to delegate to its regional directors certain powers under section 9 pertaining to representation elections. Two safeguards are included to make certain that regional directors precisely follow Board rules and policy regarding representation cases. These are, first, the explicitly stated right of the Board to review any action of a director delegated to him under the section; and second, the permissive nature of the delegation. The latter would allow the Board to withdraw the delegation from a director who refused or failed to follow Board policy in such matters. It should be emphasized that the section relates only to representation matters and is not intended in any way to alter the present supervisory authority of the General Counsel over regional directors and their staffs.

Section 702 relaxes the present ban on voting by economic strikers in representation elections. Two limitations are imposed: First, economic strikers are not to be eligible to vote after 12 months from the commencement of the strike; and second, they shall be eligible prior to that time only in accordance with regulations established by the Board consistent with the purposes of the act. In other words, a maximum length of time is established but the Board may limit the right by regulations consistent with the purposes of the act.

Section 704(c) is an amendment to the Taft-Hartley Act dealing with organizational and recognition picketing. It bans such picketing in three instances:

First, where the employer has lawfully recognized another labor organization and an election under section 9(c) is barred.

Second, where a valid representation election under section 9(c) has been conducted within the preceding 12 months. Any valid election is sufficient; the picketing union need not have been on the ballot. Otherwise, this subsection could easily be avoided through picketing by different locals of the same international union.

Third, where picketing has been conducted beyond a reasonable time (not more than 30 days) from the commencement of the picketing without a representation petition having been filed. Of course, the picketing may be enjoined in less than 30 days if the Board finds the circumstances are such as to make it unreasonable to permit it to continue and it must be stopped at the end of 30 days. The second proviso to the subsection makes an exception of picketing or other publicity directed to consumers which is for limited purposes and which does not have the effect of inducing employees of others to refuse to cross the picket line to make pickups and deliveries and to perform services. Any type of publicity, including picketing, which has this effect is not protected by the proviso. The proviso pertains to subsection (c) only and therefore consumer appeals for organizational or recognition purposes are banned after an election.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the few brief comments which I am about to make on several sections of the bill, which are in addition to those I have already made, will be helpful in clarifying legislative intent.

With reference to section 701(b), it is clearly intended that the regional directors in making any decisions or rulings pursuant to a delegation permitted by that section would be subject to and bound by the various precedents and rules and regulations established by the Board and, furthermore, an appeal to the Board is provided to prevent and/or remedy any abuse of discretion or departure from Board precedent or Board rules and regulations by the regional directors.

Section 501 imposes fiduciary responsibilities and obligations upon the officers, agents, shop stewards, and other representatives of a labor organization and provides that such persons occupy a position of trust in relation to such organization and its members. The McClellan committee recommendations on regulation and control of union funds specifically stated that:

> Since union dues moneys, as well as health and welfare funds, are in actuality a trust, being held for the members of the union by their officers, the committee feels that attention should be given to placing certain restrictions on the use of these funds, such as are now imposed on banks and other institutions which act as repositories and administrators for trust funds.
> This type of legislation, in the committee's opinion, would go a long way toward preventing wholesale misappropriation and misuse of union funds such as that disclosed by committee testimony.

Section 501 is intended to meet the needs, purposes, and objectives set forth in the McClellan committee recommendations which I have just quoted. The language of section 501 clearly and unmistakably carries out that intent.

The general principles stated in section 501 are familiar to the courts, both Federal and State, and therefore incorporate a large body of existing law applicable to trustees and a wide variety of agents. The purposes for which funds of a labor organization may be expended or invested will necessarily therefore, be restricted and limited by such existing law regardless of any provision in the constitution, bylaws or resolutions of a labor organization purporting to limit the application of such law.

Section 702 only restores the law with respect to voting of economic strikers to what it was prior to the enactment of the National Labor Relations Act of 1947, as amended, with the qualification, however, that after the expiration of 12 months after the commencement of the strike, economic strikers not eligible for reinstatement, would lose such right to vote as they may have had prior to the expiration of such 12-month period. Prior to 1947, the Board sometimes permitted either the strikers, the replacements, or both the strikers and replacements to vote depending upon all the circumstances. It is important to note that section 702 does not give employees engaged in an economic strike who are not entitled to reinstatement an unqualified right to vote. Rather this section provides that they shall be eligible to vote only under such regulations as the Board shall find are consistent with the purposes and provisions of this act and then only if the election is conducted within 12 months after the commencement of the strike.

Impressive evidence was presented to the labor committees of both Houses of Congress with respect to the devastating injury to the businesses of employers, the jobs of employees and the welfare of the public, which has often resulted from the blackmail organizational and recognition picketing activities engaged in by certain labor organizations.

The purpose of the proviso to paragraph (C) of section 704(c) which states that when such petition has been filed the Board shall forthwith direct an election, is to enable an employer or the employees to obtain a prompt election instead of having to go through an indefinite and prolonged period of picket line warfare which could have the effect of placing the employer's business and the jobs of his employees in jeopardy.

Such being the problem dealt with, it was not the intent that this proviso, which was added in conference, should be used as a device or subterfuge by a picketing union to bring about a prehearing or so-called quickie election.

Therefore, in all cases, it will be appropriate for the Board to investigate as to whether a labor organization is using the picketing as a device simply to bring about a prehearing election. Where the Board has reason to believe that this is the intent of the petitioning labor organization, the Board will be under a duty to direct the petitioner to follow the provisions of section 9(c)(1), and to afford the opportunity for a hearing. The right to a hearing is a sacred right and it should not be denied where such denial would lend support to a subterfuge.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 352, nays 52, answered "present" 1, not voting 30, as follows:

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANNOUNCEMENT

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the Members ought to know that if the Senate overrides the veto of the President on the housing bill, an attempt will be made to override it in the House today.

INTEREST RATE ON SERIES E AND SERIES H U.S. SAVINGS BONDS

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 376 and ask for its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution, it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9035) to permit the issuance of series E and H United States savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be considered as having been read for amendment. No amendment shall be in order to said bill except amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, and said amendments shall be in order, any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding. Amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means may be offered to any section of the bill at the conclusion of the general debate, but said amendments shall not be subject to amendment. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], and to myself such time as I may need.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes in order the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9035) to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes. That is a bill lifting the ceiling on the interest rate on E- and H-bonds in order to relieve the present distressed condition of the U.S. bond market. It goes no further than consideration of that one question, lifting the interest ceiling on the E- and H-bonds.

As is the case with all tax bills, this bill comes to you under a closed rule which provides 2 hours of general debate, after which the bill will be considered as having been read. It is not subject to amendment but is subject to one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order H.R. 9035, a bill to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes.

Several months ago the President of the United States sent a message to the Congress requesting legislation to, first, raise the interest rate which the Government pays on its savings bonds; and, second, to remove the limitation on the interest rate at which it is allowed to borrow money for periods longer than 5 years.

Again the other day, the President sent an urgent appeal to the Congress for action on this legislation, noting that the American people have a tremendous stake in its enactment. Failure to act, the President said, means that millions of thrifty Americans who purchase savings bonds cannot be fairly treated, since the Treasury will be unable to pay them a fair rate of interest.

And, finally, said the President, it means that responsible people at home and abroad can only conclude that we have not yet determined to manage our financial affairs as soundly as we should.

In the case of U.S. savings bonds, the interest rate which the Treasury is paying to the 40 million owners of some $42 billion worth of series E and H bonds, is limited by law to 3¼ percent. This is far below what the Treasury is compelled by market conditions to pay to other holders of its bigger I O U's, and well below what an individual can earn simply by putting his extra cash in most savings banks or institutions.

As a result, in each of the last 4 months, more savings bonds have been cashed than the Treasury has sold. To redeem these bonds and to meet its other obligations, the Treasury has had to borrow money from investors in the so-called short-term market—generally for 90 days up to 1 year. This, of course, puts the Government in competition with business firms and other small borrowers for available short-term money.

The bill which this rule makes in order fulfills but one part of the request of the President—namely, to raise the interest rate the Government pays on its savings bonds. It fails to provide the second part of his request—namely, to remove the limitation on the interest rate at which it is allowed to borrow money for periods longer than 5 years.

The second part of the President's request is ignored in this bill. The problem, in short, is to make long-term bonds more attractive so that the public will not only buy them, but will hold them until maturity.

At the present time, the Treasury is unable to sell its long-term bonds, which mature in more than 5 years, at the maximum 4¼ percent interest rate which was fixed by law in 1918. Investors can simply get a better return on their money from other sources. It means that the Treasury is obliged to continually raise 70, 80, or more billions of dollars every few months.

When members of the Committee on Ways and Means were before the Rules Committee requesting a rule on H.R. 9035, several members of the Ways and Means Committee—realizing the seriousness of including the second request of the President to remove the limitation on the interest rate at which the Treasury is allowed to borrow money for periods longer than 5 years—urged that the rule make in order the substitution of the Harrison-Simpson bill, which provides for the same.

When the present rule was considered by the Rules Committee, I moved that the substitute Harrison-Simpson bill be made in order, but my motion was defeated.

It is my sincere hope that during the debate on this bill, our colleagues, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES], and others will speak on the importance of removing the limitation on interest rates for long-term borrowing, and that their remarks will be deemed sufficiently important so that a bill will be presented before we adjourn which will take care of the matter.

Mr. Speaker, I know of no one who is opposed to the rule presently before us, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. BUDGE].

Mr. BUDGE. Mr. Speaker, while I think the chairman and the members of the Committee on Ways and Means are to be complimented for bringing this bill to the floor of the House, I also feel that it should be pointed out that the bill is in no sense a solution to the problem which confronts the Treasury of the United States. The legislation covered by this bill simply calls upon the Federal Treasury to pay more money out in interest in managing a segment of the national debt. It does absolutely nothing to give the Treasury the power to adequately and properly manage the national debt in the field of long-term financing, where that authority is most necessary. The bill could even be considered as inflationary because of the additional expenditures which will be taken out of the Federal Treasury. It is important, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the chairman and the members of the Committee on Ways and Means do, at the first possible opportunity, take the next step in granting to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to adequately manage the national debt and the problems which now confront the Nation in its fiscal management.

Those problems are serious, we could say even grave, and deserve the fullest attention of the Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I may be delaying the proceedings, but not as much as would be necessary later in the day. From the inception of our Government it has been customary for a small section of the press to question the integrity, the patriotism, and the ability of Members of the Congress. Recently that has been done in several different ways. The happenings in the last week or two have demonstrated, at least to my mind, that Congressmen—and in that I include, of course, Members of the other body—cannot, Mr. Speaker, be purchased.

More than a million dollars has been expended by unions in attempting to elect individuals to the Congress who will carry out the will of the union official. The vote in the House on the 13th and on the 14th of last month, that in the Senate prior to that, and last night in the Senate and again here today has demonstrated beyond any argument that those who received campaign contributions nevertheless vote as their judgments and consciences dictate. Many are getting sick and tired of the thought that Congressmen can be purchased as so much merchandise is bought in a supermarket. It just cannot be done. It happens that I know quite intimately practically every one of the 52 Members who just voted against this bill, and in my judgment every one of them voted his sincere conviction, and it is an outrage for the papers to continue to say that Members of Congress can be purchased either by labor organizations, by the chamber of commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, or any other group when the demand affects our national welfare.

The foregoing does not mean that the practice is approved. In my judgment it is wrong. My purpose is to call attention to the fact that often when the issue is clear Congressmen are faithful to their constituents.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

RAISING THE INTEREST RATE ON SAVINGS BONDS WILL RAISE ALL INTEREST RATES, CAUSE MORE UNFAIRNESS TO 98 PERCENT OF THE AMERICAN FAMILIES, BRING ABOUT NO MORE SAVINGS, AND STRENGTHEN THE ADMINISTRATION'S DRIVE TO BREAK THE HISTORIC 4¼ PERCENT CEILING ON MARKETABLE BONDS NOW FAVORED BY WALL STREET SPECULATORS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I will have to vote against the bill. In doing so I recognize that there are many valid arguments for the bill.

We are told that the people who buy savings bonds are the true savers. They are, of course, individual savers, not institutions. Furthermore, there are no speculative profits to be made on variations in the market price of these savings bonds. That is all true.

We are also told that the rate being paid on savings bonds is out of line, and on the low side, relative to the other interest rates. That is true.

Furthermore, we are told that the Government ought to be fair with the purchasers of savings bonds and give them a rate which is on a parity with the rates the Government is paying on its marketable bonds, considering, of course, that some differential is justified by reason of the fact that the Government stands ready to cash in the savings bonds at par at any time. In other words, the person who puts $100 in a savings bond can be sure of getting back $100, whereas if he puts his $100 in a marketable bond it may be that he will get back only $90, or $80, or $70, or even less. No one can be sure these days, because of our Government's policy of raising interest rates higher and higher, and thus reducing the market value of bonds which have been previously issued at lower rates.

The argument that we should be fair to these savers who purchase savings bonds appeals to me very much. If we could raise the interest rate on these bonds without also raising all other interest rates, I would be for it. But I think the effect of raising these rates will be to raise all rates, and we will thus cause a much greater unfairness to the overwhelming majority of the American people than if we held the rate as it is.

If we do anything to cause, or to make it easier for this administration, with the help of the Federal Reserve System, to raise the general level of interest rates, we will greatly penalize the overwhelming majority of the American people in return for more special benefits to the big money lenders and the very small percentage of wealthy families in the country. We will cause more inflation. All prices will go up, and this will take a bite out of every family's budget. Utility rates will go up. Taxes will go up. And the cost to consumers of financing a home, or buying things on the installment plan will all be increased. I think that raising the rate of savings bonds will automatically increase all other rates. Furthermore, the effect of increasing the other rates will be to put those of us in Congress who are trying to hold the line against repealing the ceiling on marketable bonds in a weak position to hold out against the administration's efforts to pry the lid off of these bonds, which means prying the lid off all interest rates.

And that, of course, is the administration's main objective. It has succeeded in getting interest rates up now above the 40-year record, and this is a most historic record, during which the previous Democratic administrations were able to lick a depression and fight the greatest war in history without violating this 40-year ceiling.

RAISING INTEREST RATES DOES NOT INCREASE THE SUPPLY OF SAVINGS

Here are the considerations which lead me to believe the bill is bad.

First, will raising interest rates on these bonds bring about any larger amount of savings? No, I do not think so. A larger amount of savings could be brought about if the administration would put on a campaign to sell savings bonds. If the administration would put only half the effort into a campaign to encourage savings as it has been putting into its campaign to frighten people about inflation, it could solve its problem and get interest rates down, if it wanted to get interest rates down. But that would be contrary to the administration's policy. The administration's policy is to get interest rates up, not down.

The point is simply this: We have had high interest rates and we have had low interest rates, but the American people have not saved any larger percentage of their incomes when interest rates were high than when interest rates were low. This is according to the official Department of Commerce figures. Within the last decade interest rates in general, including interest rates that were available to family savers, have been changed from year-to-year by almost 100 percent. When the rates were doubled people saved less as often as they have saved more. Similarly, when the rates were cut in half, people have saved more as often as they saved less.

So raising interest rates on the savings bonds is not going to bring about a greater supply of savings. Raising interest rates in general is not going to bring about a greater supply of savings. All it will do is to cause us to pay more interest on the same amount of savings, making the rate on savings bonds competitive with rates paid on time and savings accounts will cause these rates to be raised.

Now the argument we hear is that people are cashing in their savings bonds in order to put their money where they can get a higher rate of interest. The argument is that the commercial banks are paying somewhat higher rates on time deposits, the mutual savings banks are also paying higher rates on savings deposits, and the savings and loan associations are paying higher dividends. Thus we are told that this is the reason that more savings bonds are being cashed in than are currently being sold.

There is a great deal of truth in this, although the truth is being greatly exaggerated. One of the reasons that people are cashing in their savings bonds is that consumer spending in general is on the rise. At such times people cash ing their savings bonds in order to buy the things they have been saving to buy, not to put their money in some other form of savings.

There is enough truth in the statement that people are transferring their savings, however, to put us on warning against doing the thing we are being asked to do. Certainly a substantial number of people, people who have rather large amounts of savings, while they do not save any more by reason of high interest rates, do put their savings where they can get the best interest rate. And the argument is that the rate on savings bonds should be made competitive with the rates being paid on time and savings deposits so as to reverse the present trend and divert more savings back into savings bonds.

Remember now, raising the rates is not going to create any more savings. The whole argument is to divert savings from time deposits and from savings deposits. So if raising these rates accomplishes what the proponents of the legislation expect to accomplish, the effect will be merely to raise the rates on time and savings deposits. The State banking authorities are already under pressure to raise the rates which the mutual savings banks can pay. And the Federal Reserve is already under pressure to raise the rate which its member banks can pay on time deposits. What will prevent these authorities from raising these rates? Nothing. They will, in my judgment, promptly do so.

This will mean, then, that the commercial banks and the mutual savings banks will promptly raise their lending rates, first on mortgages, then on other types of loans. The savings and loan associations will be squeezed, and they will have to raise both their lending rates and their dividend rates. So shortly after we raise the rates on these savings bonds, the new rates will be just as much out of line as now, and there will be the same arguments and the same justifications for raising them again. Furthermore, the administration, which says it wants to treat its savers fairly, will have to ask for another increase in the rate paid on postal savings accounts, bevause this rate is also 3 percent.

HIGHER RATES ON SAVINGS BONDS WILL ATTRACT NO MORE SAVINGS BUT WILL HELP RAISE THE RATE ON 4¼ SPECULATORS BONDS

Finally, market rates will still be even more out of line with the 4¼ percent ceiling on marketable bonds, and Congress will be under a great deal more pressure to pry the lid off marketable bonds, and when this happens the sky will be the limit on all interest rates.

The unavoidable issue, it seems to me, is whether we are going to have a roll forward or a rollback in the general level of interest rates. Raising the rate on savings bonds will in no way resolve this issue. It will only increase the likelihood that the issue will be resolved in favor of the moneylenders, in favor of more inflation, and in favor of a further redistribution of the income in favor of the wealthy at the expense of the few.

Let us consider how many people will be helped by raising the rate on savings bonds as against the number of people who will be hurt.

First, only a very small percentage of all the families in the country have any savings at all in the form of liquid assets. The low-income families have, altogether, very little in the way of savings. It is the high-income families and the very wealthy families who do substantially all of the saving.

SEVENTY-THREE PERCENT OF THE FAMILIES OWN NO SAVINGS BONDS—FIVE PERCENT OF THE FAMILIES OWN EIGHTY-SEVEN PERCENT OF THE BONDS

According to a recent survey by the Federal Reserve Board, 73 percent of the families of this country own no savings bonds whatever. They will still own no savings bonds after the rate on these bonds is raised, but they will pay out a great deal more money in higher prices, higher taxes, higher carrying charges, and higher utility rates if this bill is passed.

Only 9 percent of the families own savings bonds in an amount of $1,000 or more. And we might ask what will this bill mean to a family owning $1,000 worth of savings bonds? The administration has told us that if we take the ceiling off the rate on savings bonds it expects to raise the rate by one-half of 1 percent. This will mean, then, that a very few families will receive as much as $5 a year as a result of this bill. That is a very small amount, indeed, and to go to a very few people, to justify increasing interest costs on every family in the country.

Just how are the savings distributed?

The recent survey by the Federal Reserve Board made early this year, shows that only 5 percent of the families in this country own savings bonds in amounts of $2,000 or more. These 5 percent of the families own 87 percent of all the savings bonds outstanding.

Furthermore, if we had the facts I have no doubt that even among this 5 percent of the families a great majority own bonds only in the neighborhood of $2,000 worth, and that three-fourths or more of all the outstanding savings bonds are owned by no more than 1 percent or 2 percent of all the families in the country.

So, in answer to the plea that we ought to be fair to the savings bondholders, we have got to remember that this means that we will authorize interest payments in significant amounts to no more than 2 percent or 3 percent of the families of the country, while we will take a much greater slice out of the budget of the average family.

INTEREST RATES DO NOT REFLECT SUPPLY AND DEMAND—ARE FIXED BY ADMINISTRATION POLICY

Now, of course, the basic premise in all the propaganda we are hearing and reading these days is that the Government is helpless in this matter of interest rates, that interest rates are simply a free market reflection of the supply and demand for funds. Nonsense. If interest rates were determined in a free market and did reflect supply and demand, I would be for taking off all ceilings on interest rates. But this imaginary world that we read about in the administration's propaganda is not the kind of world we actually live in. It has been this administration's deliberate policy to raise interest rates, and the truth is that interest rates can be determined only by the Federal Reserve System and the Treasury. Let me illustrate.

In 1952 and in 1953 interest rates were relatively low. In 1957, they were almost doubled. What were the results? Was the supply of savings increased?

Well, the Department of Commerce reports that in 1952 and 1953, the American people saved 7.8 percent and 7.9 percent of their personal disposable incomes in those years respectively. In 1957, they saved somewhat less—7.5 percent, notwithstanding the doubling of interest rates.

But was the demand for savings as great in 1957? Can we say that the big investment boom of that year took a larger share of the national income? No; it did not. It took a much less percentage of the national income than in 1952 and 1953.

We recognize two kinds of demand on the national income. One is for consumption. The other is for savings to finance the gross private domestic investment—which includes plant expansion, business inventories, housing, and so on—to finance also the net deficits of all governments, and to finance the net foreign investment, including that brought about by the foreign aid programs.

In 1952, the total demand for savings amounted to 18.3 percent and 18.1 percent, respectively, of the national income, including, of course, business income. In 1957, the total demand for savings had dropped to only 16.8 percent of the national income. So obviously supply and demand for savings had nothing to do with the fact that interest rates were almost doubled. Interest rates had been raised only because the administration, with the help of the Federal Reserve, decided to raise them. And the same is true today. Interest rates have now been raised even above the previous record of 1957. Yet so far this year the demand for savings is a lesser percentage of the national income than in 1952 and 1953. This is a remarkable accomplishment. Certainly we have learned by now that if we do not take a firm stand against this policy of raising interest rates higher and higher, the sky will be the limit.

INTEREST RATE ON SERIES E AND H U.S. SAVINGS BONDS

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9035) to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 9035, with Mr. UDALL in the chair.

The clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, as you are well aware, the question of public debt management has occupied a considerable portion of the public press over the last three months. This started with a series of proposals advanced to the Congress and then in public hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means. Broadly I could summarize these proposals as follows, in three parts.

The first proposal was to remove the statutory ceiling interest rate of 4½ percent on Government bonds with a maturity of 5 years or longer.

The second part of the over-all proposal was to remove the statutory ceiling interest rate of 3.26 percent on series E and H bonds known as savings bonds.

Then, the third part of the proposal was to provide a number of statutory changes affecting debt management, including provisions for certain tax-free bond exchanges that would make possible an advance refunding of a portion of the public debt.

The bill before the committee, Mr. Chairman, H.R. 9035, deals with the last two of these three sets of proposals. The bill provides that the President may issue a finding that the national interest requires that series E and series H savings bonds be sold at an interest rate above the present statutory ceiling of 3.26 percent. The bill also provides all of the special debt management provisions which the Treasury Department asked for. I might elaborate very briefly on what the bill does provide. Basically it gives the President authority to act as though there were no statutory ceiling on the interest rate on Series E and H bonds. The President also has the authority to provide that in the case of outstanding bonds of this nature, E and H, the redemption values for interest periods beginning after June 1, 1959, shall be increased proportionately to whatever the new interest rate is and with respect to new issues of E and H bonds let me illustrate how this works.

If you have a bond which you purchased for $75 on June 2 last, the bond would presently show a redemption value after it had been held for 6 months of $75.60. Under a schedule which the Treasury has indicated it might follow with respect to the new bond sales, the redemption value on this bond would be actually set at $75.64 after 6 months and it would advance so that the bond would mature at $100 after 7 years and 9 months instead of 8 years and 11 months as is the case at the present time under existing law.

The other detailed provisions include a more generous authorization for the Treasury to permit continued holding of matured savings bonds at current interest rates.

Next, the bill contains a provision for relief from liability after 10 years for individuals who make erroneous payments in redeeming these U.S. bonds.

Third. Permission for the trust funds to buy new issues of Government bonds at the issue price rather than at par, since this will be the market price.

Fourth. A reaffirmation of the exemption from certain local taxes on Federal bonds.

Fifth. The provision for nonrecognition of gain or loss on certain exchanges of U.S. obligations from the Treasury where the Secretary of the Treasury has provided under regulation that the nonrecognition treatment will apply to this type of exchange.

We are told by the Secretary of the Treasury that the principal purpose of this provision is to make possible an advance refunding of certain outstanding bonds now selling at a discount as part of the program for extending maturities of the debt. This nonrecognition feature will be of particular advantage to certain savings institutions which will be able to avoid showing a book loss at the time of the refunding.

I think there is little need to emphasize the desirability, the actual requirement, that Congress take some action with respect to the savings bonds sales. I am sure all Members of Congress know, because most all of us hold certainly E-bonds if we do not both E- and H-bonds, that E-bonds are bonds largely held by individuals. In 1957 the change was made with respect to E- and H-bonds, that they can be held by other than individuals except that no one can purchase more of them in any calendar year than $10,000 in maturity value, and except that commercial banks cannot own E- and H-bonds. The interest has been figured on E- and H-bonds of recent issue of the last several months at 3¼ percent. We are in a position today of finding that we are having more of these E- and H-bonds cashed than we are actually selling, and in this present third quarter of 1959 we are told that the redemption of series E- and H-bonds will be in excess of $500 million more than the actual sale of E- and H-bonds in this period.

I am saying in this quarter of this year, the third quarter, the one we are in now, we expect that redemptions will exceed sales of E-bonds by approximately one-half billion dollars. This figure would be much higher, frankly, in my opinion, if it were not for the fact that a great deal of publicity has been given to the possibility—really more than a possibility, I would say—of the interest rate on these bonds being raised effective as of June 1, 1959.

People have been holding them, in my opinion, with the expectation that Congress would enact legislation which will permit some increase in the interest rate. If we should adjourn without taking action which they expect will be taken, and which I hope will be taken, I am satisfied for the next quarter of this year and for the immediate future until remedial action is taken in another session of the Congress that the redemption rate would far exceed this $500 million figure per quarter, that is, the redemption rate over the sale of new bonds. Now, why is it so important that we not let disaster occur to the savings bond program? First of all, we are talking here in terms of that part of the overall debt of the country that will be owned largely by individuals. Almost all of these E- and H-bonds are owned by individuals although, as I said, corporations and others can own them—except that commercial banks cannot. Most of them are owned by individuals. The inflationary effect of your huge public debt is felt far less, if it is held by individuals than if it is held by banks. I think anybody would agree with this. Certainly, it is a fact. Should we not permit an increase in interest what would we be doing? We would be creating a situation wherein the very people we want to hold a maximum amount of this debt will be surrendering their holding of the debt. So the Treasury then would have to go into the marketplace and use short-term paper or other long-term paper to replace that which is lost through surrendering these E- and H-bonds by individuals, which is a very stable holding of a large part of our debt. Now, then, where are they going to go? They are going to go to the banks and other institutions; are they not? They are going right to these lending institutions and place more and more of the debt into the holding in them, and the holdings become greater and the inflationary effect of the debt becomes more pronounced. That is one of the primary reasons why I think we must do something about this ceiling on E- and H-bonds. Then, in addition to that, it occurs to me we ought not to expect people to be willing, as patriotic as their motives are, to put their savings into a Government paper on which they can only get 3¼ percent when all in the world they have to do is to walk down the street and put their money into a mutual savings bank, a building and loan association, or other savings account, and get 4 percent or some such figure for their savings. Now we are not, and let no one mislead you, we are not here proposing that the Government step in through the management of the public debt to increase the rate of interest that people can get for savings. What we are trying to do here is to put the Treasury Department in a position of being able to compete for the savings that people have in the area of E- and H-bonds, and not be left with a situation such as they will be without this degree of relief that this legislation affords.

There are other reasons I could advance for this program as to why it should be done. But is it not common fairness to these people who have, because of patriotic reasons, permitted a deduction from payroll for E-bonds to get at least as fair a break on interest rate as others may be getting who did not put their money into E-bonds? Furthermore, is it not just as fair for them to get a break as it is for those who are not individuals but incorporated in the form of a commercial bank to get the interest? I think it is. I appeal to the membership, certainly, to do this that we are suggesting from the Committee on Ways and Means today.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I am glad to yield to my colleague.

Mr. BAILEY. Has the committee ascertained what part of this investment that the ordinary individual would have to invest in Government bonds is being diverted to spending on the stock exchange?

Mr. MILLS. I will say to my colleague from West Virginia that I do not have that information and I do not know if there is any way to get the answer to it. I would imagine that some redemptions result from the fact that people from time to time have a need to draw on their savings and will liquidate some of them.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman will agree with me that they also get liquidated in the fluctuations of the market.

Mr. MILLS. Certainly, but I think most of the redemptions are due to the fact that the people feel, very frankly, that they can get more interest on their savings if they go into some other form of investment than in E's and H's and being wise investors many do just that.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. Do I understand correctly that this applies to series E- and H-bonds?

Mr. MILLS. To them only.

Mr. GROSS. And that have matured on or before July 1 or are being presently purchased?

Mr. MILLS. No, sir; those individuals who are possessed of E- and H-bonds as of June 1, 1959, will get the benefit as of that date forward of such increases in the interest rate as are provided with respect to new issues of the bonds, E's and H's, that are issued under the authority contained in the bill to exceed the 3.25 percent; so we would have to do that. I am sure the gentleman understands that if we did not do this the people who owned E- and H-bonds would immediately turn them in, then turn right around and buy new savings bonds carrying the higher rate of interest.

Mr. Chairman, I had intended to say something about a part of the overall program that is not in this bill. It was in this area of the 4¼ percent interest rate on long-term Government obligations other than savings bonds that we have had most of our discussion and controversy. The fact is that I do not suppose there was anybody on the committee really who opposed at any time the thought of treating series E- and series H-bondholders as we are proposing in this bill. The controversy in the committee raged over the elimination of the ceiling, or the right of the President to exceed the ceiling prescribed by law, of 4¼ percent that has been effect for 41 years with respect to long-term obligations.

Our committee gave many days and hours of serious consideration to this matter of the interest rate ceiling on Government bonds. In the first place, it was hard to see that there was any real urgency attached to this issue comparable to the urgency of changing the rates on E- and H-bonds. Right now, long-term bonds are close to the highest levels that they have reached since the 1920's. Unless one is convinced that the rates will continue to go higher, it is not wise financial practice to invest a large amount of the debt at this peak interest rate that will have to be paid for many years in the future even though current rates should decline. Certainly this proposal is more argumentative than the proposal in the bill on E- and H-bonds.

I must observe that the committee's reluctance to immediately endorse the President's proposal has not caused any panic in the investment markets. In mid-June when the President made his proposal to Congress the average interest yield on taxable U.S. Government bonds was 4.09 percent. In the week beginning August 15, the interest rate was 4.06 percent. In the same period, high grade municipal bonds fell from a yield of 4.04 percent to 3.94 percent and triple A corporates fell from 4.46 to 4.42 percent.

Future developments may tighten the situation at which time Congress can again look at the problems then existing.

I also believe the Treasury should gain some experience with the nonrecognition provisions to see if they will not be of considerable help.

Let me say to the membership that I am not ready at the moment to cross the bridge of removing that ceiling; I am not ready to cross the bridge of permitting the President to exceed that ceiling today. A situation can develop that is entirely possible by the time Congress reconvenes and looks at this matter, that it would be deemed feasible by a lot of us who do not now deem that action desirable or who are unwilling to undertake it at the moment. This ceiling rate has been there, as I say, for about 41 years. The Secretary of the Treasury wants authority lodged in the President to exceed it also, leaving flexibility in the management of the public debt. It is all right if one takes the position that there can be no change with respect to the trend in interest rates and that they must fluctuate further upward and upward; but I believe that this is not the time to give authority to exceed this 4¼ percent those bonds can pay. I believe this situation as far as interest rates is concerned may well have reached its peak, or if not, almost reached its peak, or that it is bound to fall. There may be a period within the next several months ahead where we will be not faced with increased rates but with the desirable prospect of a relaxation in the area. I think it would be our thought that it would now appear to be a mistake to place any appreciable portion of this public debt in long-term securities of 10, 15, 20, or 25 years committed to a rate of interest in excess of 4¼ percent that would have to be paid over that length of time without change even though the rate of interest in the meantime may well have declined to where the Government could actually finance its obligations for less.

To me this is not so pressing as is this matter of the ceiling held on E- and H-bonds. We should not finally dispose of that question today because I think it merits further consideration. It should remain alive before the Congress to be considered at such time as the Congress may want to consider it in the future, but I do not want this joined with what all of us know we ought to do now—take care of interest on the E- and H-bonds—and have the whole program bogged down somewhere along the line. The savings bond part can and should be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SANTANGELO. With respect to the E and H savings bonds, has the committee considered maintaining a rate of interest or reducing it and making the interest tax exempt?

Mr. MILLS. That has been discussed in the committee, yes. I have a very strong feeling personally about this possibility of every time something seems to be desirable of using the tax laws to give an advantage. You may say that because of the circumstances it would be highly desirable to exclude this kind of income from tax, but let me call your attention to the fact that the more of that we do the less is the ultimate possibility of making proper adjustments in the rate structure applicable to the base of our tax. It is my hope that we can stop whittling away at the tax base and make adjustments in our rate structure so that everybody can receive some benefit through that process.

In the case of interest on the public debt, the charge should be a direct charge so we know its cost. It should not be hidden in tax exemptions.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, let the record be clear at the outset that the minority Members of the House of Representatives support the proposal to provide authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay a fair and equitable yield to holders of series E and H bonds. The bill, H.R. 9035, gives that authority. The minority Members of the House were willing to do that on June 8, 1959, at the time the President transmitted his legislative recommendation on the subject of public debt management to the House.

Let the record be clear at the outset that the minority Members of the House of Representatives are also willing to support legislation that would strengthen the hand of the administration in assuring that the holders of series E and H bonds upon maturity of the bonds were paid back in dollars that had a comparable value to the dollars which they invested at the time of purchasing the bonds. The minority Members of the House were willing to do that on June 8 when the President's message was received by the Congress. The bill, H.R. 9035, in its present form does not do that. It is unconscionably and grossly deficient in that respect.

The House leadership by approving the floor consideration of H.R. 9035 after 3 months of vacillation, procrastination, and disputation has taken a timid step toward dealing with the fiscal facts of life and is today giving the House a long-awaited opportunity to be halfway responsible. It can be said with certainty that H.R. 9035 is not an adequate solution to the problem of public debt management. Regrettably, it may also be true that H.R. 9035 is no solution at all.

Three months ago on June 8, 1959, the President of the United States sent a message of unusual importance to the Congress asking the passage of legislation designed to give the Executive more realistic authority in dealing with the very momentous problem of public debt management. In asking that authority he made two specific requests with respect to interest rates payable on Government securities. First, he asked that the 3.26 percent ceiling on series E and H savings bonds be repealed. Second, he asked that the 4¼ percent interest rate ceiling on marketable bonds be repealed. He was seeking the authority to pay higher interest rates if market conditions required and if in the judgment of the responsible and capable officials charged with the management of our debt the payment of higher rates in the long term money market would have the effect of reducing the cost of maintaining our $290 billion public debt. It should be made clear that the President was not asking authority to increase interest rates needlessly. It should be made clear that he was seeking to minimize and not increase public debt costs. That his proposal was directed to the point of decreasing debt costs rather than increasing them has been attested to by the great preponderance of fiscal experts and financial writers.

Mr. Chairman, I would call attention to pages 45 to 52 of the report wherein there is a long list of editorial comment in every respect endorsing the recommendation made by the administration to do everything which is in the bill before you plus one thing more asked by the administration.

Mr. Chairman, since the receipt of the President's message on June 8 there has been much uninformed talk and no definitive action. The Committee on Ways and Means on an on-again-off-again basis has struggled to find an alternative solution to the legislative request of the President. Of course, the only real solution is to deal straightforwardly with the issue and approve the President's recommendation. Unfortunately, there were those members of the committee who, for various reasons, considered such straightforward action undesirable. On two occasions the committee marched up the hill to give tentative approval to a legislative proposal only to march back down the hill and reverse itself. The third attempt to scale the heights of fiscal responsibility has produced partial success in that we at least have before the committee the bill, H.R. 9035, dealing with the statutory ceiling on series E and H bonds and ignoring the problem caused by the ceiling on marketable bonds.

Approximately 40 million Americans hold $42 billion in savings bonds. In recent months redemptions of such bonds have exceeded sales. That fact is a reflection of public concern over the wisdom of investing in Government securities. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the same economic principles that have prompted a net redemption of savings bonds are applicable to the areas of marketable bonds. These same economic forces that have impaired Treasury endeavors to increase the holding of savings bonds have also seriously encumbered the Treasury endeavors to handle and refinance the $183 billion that is outstanding in marketable bonds, Treasury bills, notes and certificates. While 42 million Americans may be directly interested in savings bond yields, 177 million Americans are vitally and directly interested in the part of the President's recommendation that H.R. 9035 blindly disregards.

Presently our borrowing is exclusively being done by securities with less than 5-year maturities in competition with anyone and everyone, business and individuals, who seek to borrow money.

I refer you then to the first full paragraph on page 31 of the committee report where it is stated:

> Under the majority proposal the Congress runs the risk of misleading the public. We offer them, on the one hand, the assurance by the Congress of a more adequate yield on their patriotic investment in series E and H bonds.

The ones I refer to are your neighbors and my neighbors who are asked to buy and to hold series E and H bonds which today they are not buying but are selling because the interest rate is too low or because of their fear of inflation and they seek to put their money into something less likely in their judgment to suffer from inflationary effects.

That is what this bill does which is before us, but by restricting the Treasury refinancing to the short-term market we could merely be fanning the fires of inflation with the consequence that at maturity these savings bonds would be redeemed at a higher yield but with an inflation-eroded dollar.

It is said that we should vote to take care of the savings bond matter because that is all we can hope to get through the Congress in the closing days of this session. It is also said that the Congress can take another look at the neglected portion of the President's recommendation next year. The Congress has been looking for 3 months now under the most urgent and compelling conditions that argue in favor of granting the President the authority he requested. That 3-month look has produced no result.

If the leadership procrastination had not brought us to the point of imminent adjournment before this legislation was allowed to come before the House, this issue could have been more thoroughly considered by the membership. The proponents of procrastination have used the other body as an alibi for no House action. But, Mr. Chairman, that alibi is no longer available to them. We were also told, Mr. Chairman, that a gas tax increase could not be gotten through the House of Representatives, but yesterday the House of Representatives voted by a vote of 243 yeas to 162 nays to support a gas tax increase.

I believe the time has come when the leadership must cease discounting the willingness of the House to deal responsibly with national issues. The leadership should give the House the opportunity to decide for itself what its attitude will be on legislative matters.

The President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board of Governors, and the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means have all been diligent in our efforts to overcome the "sit and wait" obstruction tactics of the House leadership. We have persisted in our endeavors not as a "political play" but instead, because we knew the best interests of our Nation and indeed of the free world, required such action.

Despite all contentions to the contrary, the majority-approved proposal is inflationary in its import. It will have the practical effect of forcing the Treasury to refinance approximately $74 billion in the next 12 months in the short-term—under 5 years—money market. In refinancing this huge portion of our $290-billion debt in such a way we will be keeping a large portion of the total national savings in the next thing to money as far as liquidity is concerned. In addition by limiting the Treasury Department to short-term money we are placing the Federal Government in competition with the same sources of borrowing that are resorted to by small business for working capital and capital improvement, and by the American public as consumers in purchasing automobiles and other durable goods. This concentration of the forces of borrowing demand in the short-term money market will inevitably force the interest rate on short-term money to continue to climb. This will impose the havoc of inflation on the American people and will add inestimably to the cost of maintaining the public debt.

Mr. Chairman, if we were to improve this legislation by adopting the motion to recommit we could then with honesty say that we are assuming our responsibility as legislators in passing this legislation and putting the responsibility for the debt management where it belongs, namely the administration. The President on August 25 stated:

> The administration is willing to assume full responsibility for managing the Federal Government's debt if it is allowed to do so free from artificial restrictions and on a parity with other borrowers.

The inference is and the fact is that if we in the Congress refuse to remove the artificial barriers which in effect force the Government to borrow money in the short-term field, the responsibility for the inflationary effects of borrowing money in this short-term area rests with us. We will not here be doing our duty as responsible legislators if we do not give the authority to the President as he has requested.

The President stated further on August 25, in referring to this legislation—and I hope you will listen: "No issue of greater importance has come before this session of Congress." Think of that. Not the labor bill; not the highway bill; not mutual security; the legislative issue before us today is of primary importance. No issue of greater importance has come before this session of Congress than this question of the security of the debt of the United States in the hands of its citizens, representing their lifetime savings. I repeat that this request of the President has been supported by every sound financial writer, and we of the Committee on Ways and Means do not bring you that part of the bill which is the most vital and anti-inflationary part of the requested legislation. It is true the Treasury says they will accept this bill if it becomes law, but emphatically as of yesterday the Secretary of the Treasury said it is inadequate. He said it is no compromise with the Treasury; it is inadequate. He said the Treasury will continue to urge that the ceiling on long-term bonds be removed. The Treasury is no party to this legislation before us.

The phrase to keep in mind is "good debt management." That is the phrase which keeps cropping up time after time, "good debt management." What can be done to borrow the money the cheapest and with the greatest possibility of avoiding inflation? The one thing that stops us in this law passed 41 years ago which limits the authority for long-term investments to an interest rate of 4¼ percent or less. There is no limit on what we pay for short-term money. That could go up and up and up, and will go up unless we allow the Treasury to tap those sources of funds which are available on a long-term basis.

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HIESTAND. The gentleman has said that concentrating so large a part of our debt on short-term money is inflationary, and we say that that is true. A high percentage of that investment goes to commercial houses and banks.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. A large part of it goes to that type of purchaser and is, in effect, money which provides a basis for the issuance of new money. It may be cash on demand, and a large part of it is only 90-day paper, anyway.

Mr. HIESTAND. Can the gentleman state about how much of that short-term money goes to financial institutions?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I regret that I cannot, offhand.

Mr. HIESTAND. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HARDY. I am searching for an answer on this subject. We talk about short-term money being inflationary and long-term money guarding against inflation. What is the cutoff period? Where does the period become inflationary and where does it prevent inflation?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. The Treasury has told us if they are permitted to invest their money with those purchasers who are willing to tie their money up for anything over 5 years, they thereby lessen or reduce the chance of that money becoming inflationary.

Mr. HARDY. Then is not the key to the problem the length of the term for which the bond is issued, or is it the individual that holds it?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Let me put it this way: The life insurance companies formerly bought vast amounts of bonds and tied up millions of dollars in long-term securities. They have completely reversed that policy and are now placing their money in the short-term area, where they can make the money available to business and personal loans.

Mr. HARDY. I would appreciate the gentleman's helping me clear up some of these questions in my own mind. In the case of a long-term bond with a relatively high interest rate, would it not have the capacity of being just as inflationary as a short-term bond in that it would provide the basis for short-term credit?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Well, the fact is that the money is tied up, and the man cannot demand that the Government give him cash. He may go on the market and endeavor to sell it.

Mr. HARDY. Is he not able to borrow?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. He may borrow on it; that is correct.

Mr. HARDY. At a lower interest rate than the long-term security?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. That would depend upon economic and monetary conditions. Now, this bill before us has the effect of increasing the cost of borrowing money from the people who buy the E- and H-bonds. Believe me, they are entitled to it for they are risking their money in a certain area when they could put their money in some other institution of lending and get a greater return. So the fact is that the costs as a result of this piece of legislation are being increased. More pressure for spending under our budget is represented by this piece of legislation and we refrain from doing anything whatever to help the Treasury Department control the influences which tend to bring about inflation.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALGER. In partial answer to the question directed earlier by the gentleman from Virginia, is it not true that the shorter the term the more liquid the money becomes; in fact, it evenually actually becomes money. In that connection may I ask the gentleman with reference to the statement on page 34 of the report if the answer is not to be found partly in this sentence:

> In the years 1920–21, the ceiling forced the Treasury to engage in 25 separate short-term debt operations at interest rates above 5 percent—or three-fourths point higher than the ceiling.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. That is right. Traditionally the short-term money will continue to increase in cost as we are forced to bid against all those who want to borrow money—businesses, individuals, and so forth.

Mr. Chairman, I could discuss the grave issue presented to the House by the inaction of the majority party in approving only a small part of the President's request for legislation at considerably greater length. Time will not permit my dealing with this subject as fully as I would like. I would, however, refer you to the supplemental views of the minority Members set forth beginning on page 29 of House Report No. 1148 which accompanies this legislation to the floor of the House. I would also call your attention to previous remarks that have been made by the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means which appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Specifically, I would refer you to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 23, 1959, beginning on page 14162; the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 30, 1959, beginning on page 14855; and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 18, 1959, beginning on page 16246. The facts, the issues, the considerations are presented in those documentary references.

Mr. Chairman, I have made frequent reference this afternoon to the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means. That is not to say that the issue before us today is a partisan issue as far as we are concerned. I will predict that the Republican Members of the House will virtually vote to a man in favor of the motion to recommit that will be offered. This will not be a partisan vote as far as we are concerned. Instead, it will be a vote to protect the investment of the very citizens we are purporting to benefit under the majority bill, namely, the holders of series E and H bonds. It will be a vote to protect the fiscal solvency and the integrity of the credit of our Nation. But I would make this point unequivocably clear that if the Democratic Party opposes the motion to recommit that I will offer instructing the Committee on Ways and Means to report back to the House immediately with a bill dealing more realistically with this problem, the responsibility for the consequences of that opposition must rest solely and exclusively with the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, the motion to recommit that I will offer while some two pages in length can be simply described.

It embodies the provisions of the bills H.R. 8637 and H.R. 8638 which are identical measures cosponsored by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], and myself. We introduced these bills at the direction of the Committee on Ways and Means after their substance had been given tentative committee approval.

These bills would deal responsibly and realistically with the problem of debt management by giving to the Executive adequate authority to seek Government borrowing in the most economical money market and to place an appropriate portion of the debt in long-term maturities. The motion to recommit would include the general substantive effect of all the provisions of H.R. 9035. But the motion would provide that for a 3-year period, upon a finding by the President that such action was in the national interest, the Secretary of the Treasury would be allowed to disregard the 3.26 percent ceiling on series E and H bonds and in addition he would be allowed to exceed the 4¼-percent ceiling on marketable securities having a maturity in excess of 5 years. In addition the motion would include the same sense of Congress expression contained in the bills introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] and myself which has been termed unobjectionable by the administration.

Mr. Chairman, let there be no mistake that a vote for this motion to recommit is a vote against inflation; a vote to defeat this motion to recommit is a vote in favor of inflation. After this vote is taken we will know who the inflationists are. The taxpayers of our Nation will know; the retired citizens living on fixed incomes will know; indeed, the world will know. The world will also know whether or not the Congress of the United States is willing for our Federal Government to take the courageous steps necessary to preserve the integrity of our national credit, the soundness of our dollar and our fiscal stability. Remember, the public confidence, at home and abroad, in our country, is at stake in the vote on this motion to recommit.

Remember, also, that this is not a vote for higher interest costs on the public debt. Instead, it is a vote to give authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to manage our public debt at least cost to our taxpayers and with minimum interference with the functioning of our free enterprise economy. If the motion is defeated, the small businessman who 3 months from now has to pay more for the money he needs for working capital or for capital improvement will know by reading the rollcall of this vote who is responsible for the tight money in the short-term market. A vote against the motion to recommit is a vote for tight money insofar as funds for borrowing are available to our consumers and to our small businessmen.

May I at this point say that at one stage of the game 15 of our members of that committee against 10 favored the reporting out of the bill which will be the recommittal motion basis to be offered a bit later on.

It is true that our committee has gone up the hill and down the hill. Believe me, a promise to wait until next year and allow inflationary circumstances to continue to grow between now and that time is not only foolish, it is dangerous. What we should do today is to adopt and send to the other body the substitute which is the basis of the recommittal motion to be offered later on.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS].

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, I take this time mainly to try to set the record straight on this very controversial issue. I think I can say in all sincerity that I have been sympathetic to the problems that Secretary Anderson has brought before the committee in connection with this matter. I think, too, that I can say that I share the concern that most Americans do about the spiraling of interest rates throughout our country.

As a matter of fact, only on the day before yesterday it was announced by the principal banks in New York that the prime rate of interest had moved up to 5 percent. That means that the very best loans, the best risks that are available in this country must pay a prime rate of 5 percent, which means that when you get down to the lesser valued risks the rate will vary from 6 to 7 and 8 percent. There is no telling how high it may go.

So, between the two propositions, namely, that of responsible financing of this tremendous public debt and the proposition of attempting to keep the cost of money at a reasonable rate, our committee has attempted to operate. Now let us review a little bit what really transpired. My good friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON], said 15 members voted to report the bill, which he is now supporting. So far as I know, that is not technically correct. Fifteen members voted to consider such a bill, but the bill that we originally agreed upon, where 18 members out of 25 members of the Committee on Ways and Means instructed the chairman to introduce a bill, was the one I am going to refer to in just a moment. I say this, Mr. Chairman, without fear of contradiction—if it had not been for what I consider the shortsighted opposition of Governor Martin, of the Federal Reserve Board, this matter would have been disposed of at least a month ago, and pretty generally to the satisfaction of everybody concerned.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS. I yield.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. The bill to which the gentleman referred did include the provision eliminating the 4¼ percent. It had the approval of 18 members.

Mr. BOGGS. Oh, yes; it did.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. So the committee at that time thought it was good legislation.

Mr. BOGGS. Yes; and the bill I refer to includes the provision that is in the bill the gentleman is going to offer as a substitute on a motion to recommit.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an observation on the point that he is just making?

Mr. BOGGS. I yield to the gentleman, if I can get a little more time.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. The Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board is not a member of the administration, and it was the administration that was requesting this; was it not?

Mr. BOGGS. Well, I must confess that kind of an argument is a tweedledee and tweedledum argument. I do not know what the Federal Reserve Board is. As a matter of fact, I get the impression it is a fourth branch of the Government. That we have a Congress of the United States, the judiciary, the executive, and a Federal Reserve Board.

After a great deal of debate, and this was a serious debate, and I do not think the members of the Committee on Ways and Means should be criticized for what transpired there—after having serious debate, we voted 18 to 7 to instruct the chairman of the committee to introduce a bill which carried out what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON] wants to do with one or two exceptions. We had in that bill what we called a sense of Congress resolution. Let me read this to you and see how much objection any of you can find to it. This is the language that Governor Martin said he could not accept under any conditions. I will read it to you:

It is the sense of Congress that the Federal Reserve System, while pursuing its primary mission of administering sound monetary policy, should, to the maximum extent consistent therewith, utilize such means as will assist in the economical and efficient management of the public debt and in so doing the System should, wherever feasible, bring about needed future monetary expansion by purchasing U.S. securities, of varying maturities.

That is the end of the quote and the end of the sense resolution.

This was the language that the Federal Reserve Board said under no conditions could it accept. I might say in connection therewith there came about an exchange of correspondence between the Republican members of our committee, if I remember correctly, and the distinguished gentleman from Texas, the honored and revered Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. RAYBURN. I was very pleased, in that connection, to read in a very conservative and well thought of business publication, Business Week, for August 1, 1959, just a month ago, the following editorial in connection with that exchange of correspondence.

It is very short; I will read it to the Committee. The title is: "The Speaker's Rebuke."

Speaker SAM RAYBURN has a sharp tongue, but there was considerable justice as well as sharpness in the rebuke he administered last week to some of the more vocal supporters of the Federal Reserve Board.

"I have been forced to the conclusion," RAYBURN declared, "that the Federal Reserve authorities have reached a point in their thinking where they consider themselves immune to any direction or suggestion by the Congress, let alone a simple expression of the sense of Congress."

Without referring to the editorial I must say that it seems to me that any reasonable person would agree with that conclusion in the light of the language which I have just now read; but returning to the editorial, it continues:

Speaker RAYBURN'S voice is a powerful one in Washington, and when he says something like this, it is worth listening to. In fairness, though, his rebuke should apply not to the Fed itself but to some of its more ardent champions who have rushed to attack the proposed "sense of Congress" amendment to the bill raising the ceiling on the interest rate the Federal Government can pay.

The merits of the amendment itself may be arguable—though it can be remarked in passing that the language is moderate and the principle has been supported by some highly qualified students of central banking (Business Week, July 18, 1959, p. 128).

But whether the amendment is wise or foolish, the right of Congress to give these or any other instructions to the Fed should be beyond question. The Fed itself has always acknowledged this. But some of its partisans with their charges of a "political foray" seem to have forgotten it.

It is a basic principle of our Government—and an excellent principle—that the expert administrator operates not by divine authority but by virtue of his ability to persuade duly elected representatives of the laity that he knows what he is doing.

Regardless of what happens to the "sense of Congress" amendment, it will be a sad day for the country—and for the Federal Reserve System—if we ever try to operate on any other basis.

That is the end of the article.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REUSS. Is it not a fact that the editor of Business Week is a very distinguished Republican, Mr. Elliott Bell, economic adviser to former Governor Dewey?

Mr. BOGGS. He could be; I really do not know.

In connection with editorials I note that some commentators—and I am always interested in commentators—you know some fellow said that you study medicine all your life and by the time you are ready to die you know a little bit about one part of medicine. Maybe the same thing applies to other professions, but these commentators and editorialists become authorities on everything overnight. I notice some of them are saying that our great Speaker has lost some of his influence and some of the affection of the Members. Without going into the record of Congress, because it is still being written, I daresay that come next week or whenever it does come that we close this first session of the 86th Congress, that it will be one that all of us can be proud of and that the stamp of SAM RAYBURN will be all over it; and it will be a good stamp.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I hate to say it, but I am afraid there has been a good bit of politics played in this thing. I do not accuse Secretary Anderson of playing politics, I genuinely do not. I think he is one of the great men in our Government. But I am concerned about Governor Martin and the people on the Federal Reserve Board who brought enough influence on our committee and the other Members of this body to have this language withdrawn.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS. No; I am not going to yield.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. The gentleman has made a very serious charge.

Mr. BOGGS. It is going to stay in the RECORD.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman has made a moderate charge.

Mr. BOGGS. The charge I made will not be changed in one iota.

When we talk about fiscal responsibility of the Government, I think the record shows that we on the Democratic side have attempted to maintain that responsibility since we have had the authority to do so. This business of throwing out words like "inflation," "spenders," and all of these other scare words that are being used should be stopped. As a matter of fact, I have not been able to count the appropriations as they have not been finally totaled, but it looks as if by the time the record is written next week or the week thereafter we will have appropriated considerably less than Mr. Eisenhower asked for in his $77 billion budget which he submitted to the Congress last year before Congress met.

The idea of coming here after the Ways and Means Committee has acted and has instructed the chairman by a vote of 18 to 7 to report this bill and saying they would not take it under any condition should not permit the administration to complain when we give them the authority to handle the E- and H-bonds. Incidently, these long-term issues which you are complaining about are not due as far as I know within the next 12 months. Is that correct?

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman has reference to the fact that none of them become due until next year.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. There are $80 billion to be refinanced in the next 12 months, no part of which can be separated.

Mr. MILLS. None of the long-term bonds come due until next year.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. It makes no difference whether it is a long-term debt or a short-term debt, we have to borrow the money to refinance the long-term debt or the short-term debt and unless we change the law we can only borrow in the short-term market, which is up to 5 years.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. I am interested in the statement made that this bill was reported by a vote of 18 to 7.

Mr. BOGGS. I did not say that, I do not believe.

Mr. BAKER. What in the world can the 10 Republicans do to keep that bill from being introduced and reported to the floor?

Mr. BOGGS. I am not charging anyone with anything. I am saying to the gentleman and to all Members of this body that the word was conveyed to me and as far as I know to my colleagues on the committee, that this so-called sense language was not acceptable to the Federal Reserve System.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 4 additional minutes. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLS. Certainly the word was conveyed to us that the administration would not accept a bill all of the 18 members told me to introduce as long as that language was in it. The bill was unsatisfactory if it contained that language. The matter could have been resolved in July or August had that language been acceptable. The gentleman from Louisiana knows that the objection that was made to it at the time was just simply patent nonsense.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS. I have very little time, but I am happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means if that was submitted to the committee? I do not know what dealings were going on with the chairman or with somebody else.

Mr. MILLS. I had no intention of introducing a bill to try to help the administration with a problem that the administration would not support.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think it should have been submitted to the committee?

Mr. BOGGS. I cannot yield further.

Mr. Chairman, we must put this thing in perspective to understand the dilemma faced by members of the committee, and I refer to those on each side, and why this sense resolution was so important. The prime rate of interest was 5 percent, the Government came in and asked for authority to raise its rates across the board. With these rates going up it meant building and loan associations, savings banks, municipalities, State bond issues, public works issues, the whole gamut of the interest structure, had to go up proportionately.

What we were trying to do was to reach a position where we could have some degree of control over this precipitous proposition. We did not think for one moment that this sense resolution in itself would do that, but we did feel that this was an expression of the feeling of the representatives of the people so that we might maintain some ceiling on these interest rates.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. We hear a lot of talk about what happened in the Committee on Ways and Means with reference to the sense resolution. The minority has the power to offer a motion to recommit. There is nothing to stop them from including in the motion the sense resolution.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I would say that the sense of Congress resolution is in there, the one presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. IKARD] and adopted. The objectionable one is not in there.

Mr. BOGGS. I am glad the gentleman used that term "objectionable" because this, of course, pins it down. The gentleman from Missouri a moment ago inquired of me as to where the objection came from and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BAKER] inquired of me as to where the objection came from. I am happy that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has pinned it right down. It comes from the administration. And, the best proof of it is that in the gentleman's substitute he does not include the language which was included in the original bill.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Permit me to say that it was Mr. IKARD's amendment which is included in the Harrison-Simpson bill.

Mr. BOGGS. I understand that, and I bow to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. IKARD]. I supported him. I was one of those who voted with him, because I feel this is a problem that we should try to work out. And, I never saw a man work harder to help resolve this problem than the gentleman from Texas, but he finally gave up and said, "My goodness. There is no way to satisfy the Federal Reserve System." That is the record, my colleagues.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct a question to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means as to whether he or anyone else contends that the bill we have before us, H.R. 9035, provides for good debt management.

Mr. MILLS. My thought is, to the extent that it goes, it does provide all necessary authority to accomplish good debt management with respect to E- and H-bonds. I have very serious doubt at the moment with respect to the part that the gentleman would include of exceeding the limit on long-term bonds, the 4¼ percent limit. I would like to know more about how much of the debt is intended to be put in these long-term securities at an interest rate in excess of 4¼ percent and indeed, whether we need a rate in excess of 4¼ percent with the change in savings bond rate.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I thank the gentleman for his answer. Of course, the point is that in order to have a bill on good debt management, we should do something about the ceiling on long-term bonds. As to the sense of Congress resolution, I do not know just where that comes in on a question of debt management, because actually it pertains to the subject of the Federal Reserve System and the way the Fed handles itself. That is a very interesting point, incidentally, because legislation affecting the Federal Reserve System under the jurisdiction of the House is in the Committee on Banking and Currency and has never been in the Committee on Ways and Means. The Committee on Ways and Means is concerned with the problems of the Treasury Department as they relate to proper debt management. It is perfectly true that the Congress does have control over the Federal Reserve, and I think a grave injustice has been done to Mr. Martin, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, in stating that he in any sense has implied that Congress does not have control over the Federal Reserve Board. It, in effect, is a creature of the Congress, and the Congress can change the Federal Reserve Act any time the Congress sees fit. Now, if the gentlemen who have been promoting this sense of Congress resolution were as sincere as they profess to be in attaining that particular end, why did they not present it to the Committee on Banking and Currency and get the change made at that time?

Now, I must say this, and I hope the gentleman from Louisiana is here, because he made a very serious charge, and I think we ought to examine it to find out just what he did mean. He said that the Federal Reserve Board exercised great pressure. I do not know just who the pressure was exerted upon and I do not know what he meant by "great pressure," but the implication and the innuendo of the word "pressure" certainly indicated something improper. I would like to have the gentleman from Louisiana identify just what he meant by the word "pressure" and whether he did mean something improper or whether he was simply referring to the facts and the logic that were presented in the full committee hearings by the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Perhaps the gentleman from Wisconsin can answer that point, and I yield to him.

Mr. REUSS. I reply only because the gentleman from Louisiana seems to be absent from the Chamber at the moment.

On July 8 of this year the Committee on Ways and Means by an affirmative vote of 18 members, as has been stated, adopted the so-called sense resolution. That was on, I believe, a Thursday. That same day the administration, through Secretary of the Treasury Anderson, accepted the package saying they could live with it. According to the Wall Street Journal, the next Monday Governor Martin spent some time with the President in the White House. We do not have a transcript of the discussion, of course, but the fact is that the next day the administration made a 180-degree switch and came out against the package which the Committee on Ways and Means, with a very statesmanlike approach, offered. I am sure that is one of the things that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS] had in mind when he said there was pressure brought by Governor Martin on the administration.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I am glad to have it identified that much. This is news to me. I do not know where this omniscience comes from.

Mr. REUSS. From reading the Wall Street Journal.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I am glad to know that that is the gentleman's authority and that that is the source. Actually this matter was not presented to the Ways and Means Committee. The Republican members, I might state, on the Ways and Means Committee, certainly never changed their position on this particular sense of Congress. We had accepted it. We had worked the thing out. As a matter of fact, the Committee on Ways and Means did not even meet for another 2 or 3 weeks, as I recall it, at which time the chairman and the gentleman from Texas offered a substitute resolution which was presented, on the basis that this would be acceptable to certain groups on the Democratic side, so that it could get through the House; otherwise it would not be voted up by the House of Representatives. That was the argument used in the committee as to why the Committee on Ways and Means should not do what they thought was right, because we could not get it through on the floor of the House. The position on our side of the aisle was that if we thought it was right, let us go to the House, present our arguments and let those who disagreed with us have the opportunity to present their side. Then we could see whether or not the House wanted to back us.

At one stage of the game I made this remarks in the Ways and Means Committee, that I thought that all we needed was about 80 votes on the Democratic side of the aisle and we could get the package through, just as the administration had requested, which included the Ikard amendment. The latest argument for no House action is that it is not the House that would not act but that the Senate would not act. That is when we got into this long course of up and down the hill and up and down the hill.

Mr. Chairman, what I want to get back to is this. I think it is very wrong for irresponsible statements to be made in debate. Statements made in debate ought to be backed up. I am satisfied from my knowledge of Bill Martin, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, that he would never exercise anything that could even be implied as being improper pressure. Certainly he advanced arguments and facts as best he could. It was his duty to do so. Is it not very strange that a Republican has to take the floor of the House to defend the former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Truman, because that was Mr. Martin's position before he became Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. This man is a dedicated public servant. I may disagree with him or agree with him. There are some things on which I have disagreed and others on which I have agreed. But I do not think anyone on either side of the aisle should imply that Bill Martin does anything other than act with a full sense of his own conviction of what is right, and he does it above board and in open committee hearings so that all the facts can be seen.

I think the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS] owes an apology to the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board for the innuendo that he has left here.

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BOGGS. I have no intention of apologizing. I stand on the statement that I made.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I am very sorry that the gentleman from Louisiana has said that. I think he owes it not only to his colleagues on his side, but to himself, to the rest of the House, and to this country to back up his charges of pressure. I do not know what the gentleman meant when he said pressure. I assumed, and the innuendo was, that it was something improper, something other than facts and arguments.

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BOGGS. The answer was very simple; "We will not accept this bill."

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Is that what the gentleman meant by pressure? Will the gentleman from Louisiana answer that? Is that what the gentleman meant when he waved his arms and shouted around here about pressure?

Mr. BOGGS. When does the Federal Reserve Board have the right to dictate to Congress? That is dictation.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I might say to my friend that he did not have to dictate to the Congress, if the Ways and Means Committee had done exactly what we on our side wanted to do, namely, come in before the Congress and the House and present this matter. You have the votes. What does the gentleman mean by pressure? Is it the gentleman who was being pressured?

Mr. IKARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. IKARD. In connection with the use of the word pressure, I think the most effective pressure that can be exercised in a legislative body was used; that is, at least as far as I was concerned. It was indicated to me by responsible men on the Republican side that even though the committee had voted 18 to 7, or something like that, to introduce the bill, when it came up to the matter of reporting it, there would not be a single Republican vote for it.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Oh, no.

Mr. IKARD. I am just reporting what I was told by Republican Members. Would the gentleman have voted to report the bill out?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Yes; as a matter of fact I did on the 18 to 7 vote. And I also voted for the gentleman's amendment. And my position was that I was even for reporting this particular bill out.

Mr. IKARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. IKARD. The gentleman referred to both of these amendments as being mine. While I voted for both of them, and I have no apology to make for that, I have asked that the minutes of the committee be checked, so that I may be correct.

But my recollection, which I have confirmed with the staff of the committee, is that I offered neither of these amendments and they were offered by other distinguished members of the committee. If they are called by my name, that is fine with me, but I would just like the record to be straight.

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? He mentioned my name several times.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I want to make a final statement because I have only 1 additional minute.

Mr. BOGGS. I yielded to the gentleman several times.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I have yielded to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say this. Getting away from all this discussion, we are faced with a very serious situation. If we do not do something along the line proposed in this motion to recommit, which will bring back to the House a bill which will permit long-term bonds to be sold, we are going to create an inflationary situation that is going to badly damage this country. We cannot wait for 3 or 4 months. The damage will already be done. I predict, and I hate to predict anything of this nature, but if we do not take this action, we are possibly going to have to come back into special session to meet this problem. I think it is that serious. So, entirely apart from what happens, let us examine where we are now and whether, indeed, it is not necessary to grant to the President the authority he is asking for in order to be able to market some of this Federal debt in the long-term bond field instead of short term. We are paying well above 4¼ percent interest in the 5-years-and-below bonds, and that is inflationary as well as expensive. If we continue to confine the Federal Government to borrowing in the short-term market, we will be forcing more costly debt financing at higher interest rates.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, let us leave the Federal Reserve Board and its problems and its actions out of this situation. I want to try, in the few minutes given to me, to picture the problem, and it is a serious problem that confronts this Congress in the provisions of this bill. First, I want to say this. That this Congress and previous Congresses have spent billions of dollars more than has come into the Treasury. Therefore, to get the money to pay the bills, the Treasury has had to borrow in order to pay those bills. That is the first point I want to make.

The second point I want to make is this. The Treasury has just two ways to get the money to pay the bills. One way is the long-term way, on which 40 years ago the Congress placed a 4¼-percent limit on the interest. The other way is the short-term way below 5 years, the E- and H-bonds plus other short-term paper. On the short term, they can pay and have paid much more than the 4¼ percent. The Treasury could, if it wanted to, on the long term by evading the law sell its long-term 4¼-percent bonds at 90 percent of par or 80 percent of par, and thereby pay 6 or 7 percent interest. But that would be indirectly avoiding the law.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MASON. I will not yield for any questions.

Mr. Chairman, we have that proposition before us. If we refinance and borrow the $13 billion more that we have spent this last year on short-term paper, we are competing in the money market with other people who are borrowing to expand their businesses and that is very inflationary. A 91-day piece of paper is exactly the same as cash. It can be used in exchange and you can take it to the bank. It is due in 91 days. It is exactly the same in its operation as currency. Now to avoid that, the administration and particularly the Treasurer of the United States came in and said in order for us to manage the financial affairs of this Nation, we would like to have that 4¼ percent taken off the long-term obligations so that we can put more of our financial problems into long-term paper, and thereby avoid the inflationary situation. But in this bill we say, No, we are not ready to do that; you will have to manage the long-term debt and the finances of this Nation with handcuffs on. In other words, we are impeding the efficient, the effective, the sensible handling of the public debt. That is exactly what we are doing when we refuse this one thing that above all things is necessary in order to handle the debt of this Nation effectively.

That is the picture. I have painted it as clearly and as simply as possible. We are responsible for the debt; we are responsible for tying the hands of the Treasurer, so perhaps it is our obligation to correct that trouble.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Chairman, this legislation which is before us today may give some help in the managing of the national debt, but it is a long ways away from the flexibility that is needed if the Secretary of the Treasury is to be able to manage the national debt in a manner consistent with the best interest of 177 million Americans.

It is difficult for me to understand why there is so much opposition here today to the proposal to remove the interest ceiling on long-term obligations. If I recall correctly, I believe it was on February 4 of this year that this House voted in favor of increasing the interest rate on veterans' home loans to 5 percent. The justification that was given for the increase was that there was no money available at 4¾ percent for the veterans to obtain a loan.

Let me also point out to the membership that on June 2, 1959, the Baltimore Sun quoted Senator JOHNSON as follows:

> Senator JOHNSON * * * pointed out that in the single showdown in which high interest rates had been at issue, the Senate majority, including a majority of Democrats, had voted to pay the rates demanded by the market. The pending bill had been a GI housing measure.

So here the Democratic majority in the other body saw the light and voted to raise the interest rate to 5 percent on GI housing loans so that the GI's would have an opportunity to finance their housing, but the Democratic majority in the House cannot see the light with respect to helping all Americans protect the integrity of their savings and purchasing power.

Business News analyst Sam Dawson wrote for the Associated Press:

> If the Treasury could sell more long-term bonds to investors and more U.S. savings bonds to individuals, it would tend to dampen the fires of inflation, since such money wouldn't be breeding new credit, as short-term Treasury bills do.

One amazing statement that happens to be in the supplemental views of the committee report on page 45 is a quotation from the Baltimore Sun in which Senator DOUGLAS is quoted as saying this:

> I believe in a competitive interest rate. I do not believe that the Government should artificially lower the interest rate. Without such flexibility, the Treasury will be forced to adopt inflationary expedients and the soundness of the dollar will be even more seriously threatened than it is.

I have supported removal of the ceiling on the interest rate so far as long-term bonds are concerned because I believe it is in the best interest of my country; I believe it is one manner in which we can give flexibility to the Secretary of the Treasury so that he may be able to go into the long-term market and sell our securities at the lowest possible cost to our taxpayers. I am opposed to forcing the Treasury to finance exclusively in the short-term market which takes away the capital that is necessary to the consumers and small business people that are the backbone of our free enterprise economy. Of course, the more demands there are for money at short-term level, the higher the interest rates shall be and the Government will have to pay that rate.

On page 82 of Business Week of August 29, 1959, appears an article headed, "Is the Government Headed for a Crisis?—Congress Refusal To Lift U.S. Bond Issue Ceiling Is Starting Chain Reaction Toward Higher Rates All Around."

Mr. Chairman, I submit we cannot blindly refuse to deal with reality. We must allow the Treasury authority to finance the $290 billion public debt in the cheapest money markets. Let there be no doubt that those who oppose the full package administration proposal are the inflationists.

Mr. Chairman, it has been contended that removing the 3.26 percent ceiling rate on savings bonds is the most effective action the Government can take in combating inflationary pressure, inasmuch as sales of these bonds directly absorb consumers' purchasing power. It is also argued that removal of the 4¼-percent ceiling on marketable Treasury bonds would be inflationary, in that the higher rates on these bonds would lead to larger purchases by commercial banks and an increase in the money supply.

The removal of the savings bond ceiling rate, which will permit the Treasury to raise the rate of E- and H-bonds to 3¾ percent, will indeed facilitate efforts to combat inflation, because it will enable the Treasury to sell more securities directly to savers. Nevertheless, this action in and of itself is insufficient. No one expects that we will achieve a huge upsurge in the sale of savings bonds when the new program is put into effect; rather, the goal is primarily to prevent further deterioration. This will be beneficial, but it will by no means solve all problems of debt management.

The idea that removal of the 4¼-percent rate on marketables will lead to greater commercial bank purchases of Government bonds is absolutely incorrect. In the first place, banks are not interested today in buying Government securities, and especially those of more than 5 years' maturity. The pressure of loan demand on the part of consumers and businesses is so strong that banks are hard pressed to meet these demands with the limited funds available. This is what led to the increase in the prime lending rate earlier this week. It is only in periods of recession, when loan demands are slack and reserves readily available, that banks tend to buy many securities of more than 5 years' maturity, and even then they seldom go beyond 10 years. It is ridiculous to believe that they are interested in acquiring long-term Governments under the circumstances of today.

Secondly, if banks were to be interested at all in buying more Governments under today's conditions, they would almost certainly be shorter maturities—of less than 5 years. Banks now want to maintain their liquidity, not eat it up by putting funds into long-term investments. Consequently, restriction of the Treasury to borrowings on less than 5 years involves a much greater danger of commercial bank purchases of Governments and a resultant growth in the money supply.

Third, even if banks wanted to purchase long-term Governments at yields higher than 4¼ percent, they could easily do so right now—simply by buying some of those issues in the market. For example, the Treasury bond maturing in February 1965 is now yielding 4.75 percent. And if this bond were purchased by a bank in the 52-percent tax bracket, and held to maturity in 1965, the "taxable equivalent" return would be almost 6 percent. Thus, there are plenty of high-yielding long-term Governments available for banks that want them today. But they do not want them; they are striving to meet demands of customers for loans.

Finally, as has been emphasized many times, removal of the 4¼-percent ceiling will not cause interest rates to rise. Removal of the ceiling would be merely a recognition of the market situation—of what has happened because business is booming and demands for credit have risen to very high levels. We cannot repeal the quotations on Government securities that are made in the market every day.

Thus, the fact remains that if the Treasury is to be able to handle the debt in a sound, noninflationary manner, it must be free to borrow long-term as well as short-term money. So long as the ceiling exists, with current levels of rates, the Treasury is forced to do all of its borrowing on less than 5-year maturities. This increases the danger of a growing money supply, further inflation, and a decline in the purchasing power of our savings.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support the endeavors of the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means to improve the bill, H.R. 9035, and to then vote for its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ALGER].

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest, even as I have in committee, and I appreciate the privilege of participating in the Ways and Means Committee deliberations.

I would particularly like to call the attention of my colleagues to the minority report, page 29, because while this is a somewhat technical matter, no matter what your final viewpoint, you will will have lots of information that will help you when you go back home and in today's debate.

I want to call the attention of the House to something which I think is very interesting. While we are a political body, indeed, it is not often that men agree entirely within each party, on either side of the aisle. Neither do people agree in a family. So it is surprising to find that the Republicans are 10 out of 10 in Ways and Means Committee and we agree with the recommendations of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, Chairman of the Reserve Board, Mr. Martin, most of the bankers, and most of the newspapers. I simply feel that you ought to know there is a weight of feeling behind the expression that you will find in the minority report. To whatever degree politics has become a part of this bill and debate in trying to make an issue of whether you are for or against higher interest rates, I decry it as wrong.

What is an interest rate? Here is how I will try to explain it this fall back home. Interest rate, as I define it, is nothing but the cost of using somebody else's money. You might call it renting money. If you can get your hands on it, you have to pay a price for the use of somebody else's money. That is what interest is. Naturally, you get it depending on the normal factors of demand and supply. That, to me, is all there is to it, most simply stated.

What the Secretary has asked us for is the right to have flexibility in setting interest rates. We are asked to remove the ceiling. It is for reasons of flexibility that the Secretary testified. It is quite possible there will not be an increase in interest in many cases when negotiating in the market of long-term money. On occasion we can actually expect to borrow at a lesser rate than what we would expect otherwise.

With that thought in mind, and I hope I can have the chairman's attention, I want to call your attention to Secretary Anderson's statement. It was a masterful presentation, whether you agree or disagree with the viewpoint of the Secretary of the Treasury. I respectfully call to the attention of my colleagues—correct me if I am wrong—that all during the time the Secretary appeared before our committee in answering questions I have yet to hear anyone take issue with him: "Mr. Secretary, you are wrong in your facts."

I simply present this to you. If I am wrong, please correct me. We are all entitled to our viewpoint and our interpretation of those facts. But I have yet to find anybody, at least as far as I recall and I was there most of the time, contradict him as to fact.

He said, "Gentlemen, what we are dealing with is the value of the currency of the United States here and abroad and the very credit standing of the United States."

To me this puts it on a plane above politics and I naturally want to think that politics will not be the deciding factor. I hope it is not.

When the Secretary made that statement, he was asked by the chairman and others present, "Mr. Secretary, is there an alternative to what you propose, that is, to remove this ceiling of 4¼ percent on long-term obligations?"

He said, "Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, there is no alternative."

I will concede he was forced to partly contradict himself but only in good faith when the chairman said, "Mr. Secretary, we do not think we can get it through the House, and we are not sure we can get it through the other body. We want an alternative."

The Secretary agreed to the alternative which was for the Congress to transfer the responsibility to the administration. When the President and the Secretary of the Treasury find in the need of the national interest the necessity to raise the ceiling, they would be permitted to do so. That was the first concession made by the Secretary after he said, "Under these facts there is no alternative."

Then he further conceded when he was asked—I do not know who directed this question—"Mr. Secretary, how about the time limit?" He said, "I believe I need at least 10 years to work within this field." Then he said, "At least, 6." But, I understand—and again correct me if I am wrong—finally, a time limit was placed on him of 2 years. He said, "I do not think that is long enough." But, again, the Secretary of the Treasury has done all he could to go along with us here after saying, "However, there is no alternative to these facts, gentlemen, that our bonds are weakening; that they are being cashed in."

Mr. Chairman, in addition, it is appropriate to note that big Federal spending, beyond Federal Government income, is the big problem. To foot the bill, the money must be raised by the Treasury. To do this, the Treasury must go into the money market and borrow. At this point, the Secretary of the Treasury is handicapped by being forced by the 4¼-percent artificial interest ceiling to borrow under 5 years where there is no interest ceiling. The result is, it actually costs more in interest which costs the taxpayer more. The Federal Government is in competition with auto purchasers, families, and small businessmen for the short term loan money. All of which is caused by the same big spenders who first occasioned the need for borrowing and, secondly, who refuse to lift the artificial interest ceiling in Government borrowing over 5 years.

It is time we accepted the fact of Secretary Anderson and lift the 4¼-percent ceiling, not just increase the interest rates on E- and H-bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. IKARD].

Mr. IKARD. Mr. Chairman, it had not been my intention earlier in the day to take any time in the debate, for I felt that the issues were clear and that this would be a matter that could be disposed of in short order.

Now, however, since certain implications have been injected into this debate, I think it is only fair that the whole story be told here. In the first place the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS], asked a moment ago about some evidence of pressure in regard to this first amendment expressing the sense of Congress to which reference was made earlier. Now, I have here in my hand a statement that is signed by 10 Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means. It was addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. It is dated July 23, 1959. The text of that letter with respect to this amendment is as follows, and I quote:

> The second amendment to which we object would express the sense of Congress that the Federal Reserve System should return to the discredited wartime practice of supporting the price of Government bonds. As evidenced by comments on the floor of the House by members of your own party, there is confusion as to whether this amendment would be mandatory or permissive on the Federal Reserve System. Regardless of its intent in this respect, its inflationary implications would tend to destroy the public confidence we seek to maintain.
> These amendments would be injurious to proper debt management and would tend to deprive the Federal Reserve System of the discretionary flexibility in monetary affairs that the Congress has historically recognized the need for it to have. We are categorically opposed to any amendments that would serve to destroy the very public confidence that we are seeking to protect by this legislation.

Then the 10 Republican members of the committee go on in the letter to say why they are opposed to any amendments that have been considered to date. Now, this was after the vote in the committee to introduce a bill before it was reported. That vote was 18 to 7. Here are some 10 pages of press releases and letters, with at least 8 or 9 saying in effect that the Republicans no longer can support the measure.

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IKARD. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BOGGS. In connection with the same document from which the gentleman is quoting, the gentleman standing to my right, Mr. CURTIS of Missouri, in his request that I apologize to Mr. Martin, to which I said I would not under any circumstances, wanted some evidence of where the pressure came from. Well, in this same document there is a copy of a letter dated July 14, 1959, addressed to the Honorable RICHARD M. SIMPSON, signed by William McChesney Martin, Jr., who is the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, wherein he takes great exception to the sense of the committee amendment, as he calls it. I will not take time to read his letter, but I hope that the gentleman in his remarks will make it a part of the RECORD at this point. I would also like to say to the gentleman, in connection with the apology request of the gentleman from Missouri, that he might address a similar letter to Business Week and see if they will apologize to Mr. Martin.

Mr. IKARD. I will be glad to make the letter a part of my remarks at this point.

BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM,
Washington, July 14, 1959.

The Honorable RICHARD M. SIMPSON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SIMPSON: This response to the request contained in your letter of July 13 puts in writing the gist of the comments I made in the executive session meetings of the Ways and Means Committee on the amendments to the legislative proposals originally offered by the administration.

It is my considered judgment we are facing a serious financial situation. The limitation on interest rates is unrealistic in the light of present market quotations and denies the U.S. Treasury the tools essential to effective balanced handling of its borrowing needs. By statute the Treasury is now limited, because of the ceilings, to the issue of short-term certificates which under present conditions of rising prosperity is dangerous. These short-term obligations can readily be converted into money at the option of the holder. In effect, they are a substitute for money, and thus could swell the flow of money far beyond that needed to purchase available goods and services at current price levels. The threat of a money flow out of hand has a major impact on the cost of living and places a burden on all of us.

It serves no useful purpose at the moment to argue whose fault it is that we are in our present predicament. The fact of the matter is we are in it. The committee is not being asked to vote whether interest rates should or would go up or down, but merely to grant the Treasury authority to exercise its best judgment in meeting an existing problem. We are discussing a crucial matter—the credit of the United States. Failure to deal with this could (and I was careful not to threaten or assert that it necessarily would) have the most serious implications. It was my duty to warn of this, much as I disliked the task. These are the basic facts with which we were dealing and any amendments must be considered in this light.

The amendment to retain the statutory ceilings but permit them to be disregarded if the President found the national interest so required did not seem to me to present unworkable problems. Accordingly, I did not raise objections, although I prefer the original.

The "sense of the Committee" amendment is quite a different matter. I object to this on principle. The Open Market Committee and the Federal Reserve Board are given the responsibility under the Federal Reserve Act for regulating the money supply. If the Congress wishes to spell out the means of doing this, it should amend the Federal Reserve Act and not tack this onto a debt management bill.

Furthermore, under present conditions, I am convinced that this amendment, when stripped of all technicalities, and regardless of whether the language is permissive or mandatory, will cause many thoughtful people both at home and abroad to question the will of our Government to manage its financial affairs without recourse to the printing press. To me this is a grave matter. We are here dealing with trust and confidence which is the keystone of sound currency. Therefore, I must oppose this proposal as vigorously as possible, as I did during the hearings.

The amendment limiting the President's authority to 2 years is, in my judgment, unsound. It could be a source of embarrassment to both the next President and the then Secretary of the Treasury.

I have tried as faithfully as possible to summarize what I actually said during the hearings, and not to introduce new ideas. May I, in conclusion, thank you and all the members of the Committee for the courtesy and consideration shown me and my associates throughout the meetings. I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to Chairman MILLS.

Sincerely yours,

WM. MCC. MARTIN, JR.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I did address a letter to the editor of Business Week, and I got a very interesting reply, and within 3 weeks Business Week had a different approach about this whole matter. Now, to get back to the specific question here, though, the gentleman will recognize, of course, that many times we will vote a measure out of committee, feeling that we can get it on the floor of the House and argue against amendments. As a matter of fact, I voted this measure out feeling that we would have an opportunity to compose the alternatives in this narrow area. So, although I did feel that way about the sense of Congress resolution, I certainly would have voted and did vote that out of the committee, knowing that we would have the right to try to do something on the floor. One final comment, if I may. If that is all the gentleman from Louisiana is referring to as pressure, I am not worried about that. The implication of improper pressure was a matter that I was concerned about.

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, of course, I am not a member of this administration and I do not know how heavy pressure can get. They tell me that a few days ago on a certain matter here there was a lot of pressure, so I consider this very severe pressure.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Evidently it was severe enough to make the Democrats change their minds on the thing.

Mr. IKARD. Mr. Chairman, as I said in the beginning, these are collateral matters away from the basic issue. I think it is reasonable that the Treasury be given these technical amendments that provide the implements for better and more effective debt management. Certainly there can be no serious objection, in my judgment, to the adjustments of the rates that savings bonds might bear. Even though admittedly I have been interested personally in trying to find some solution to this problem and, frankly feel to some degree the Treasury should have greater flexibility in the long-term securities, that is a much more serious question and one which involves some rather basic and fundamental decisions which are not at issue here in the committee bill.

It is my judgement that the committee bill should be acted upon favorably and that the motion to recommit with instructions should be voted down.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS].

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interested in the statements of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS] concerning pressure on this bill. I recall about a year ago when extention of the so-called Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was before the House. Never was there more brazen pressure put upon the Congress than that by Eric Johnston and some others, including certain administration officials in support of that legislation. But I did not hear the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. BOGGS], one of the most vocal supporters of the free trade bill, cry out about that. He did not shed a single crocodile tear. I did not hear him raise his voice about pressure then; no, not for half a second. With him it apparently depends upon whose boar is in the cabbage patch.

Mr. Chairman, I took this time primarily to ask a question or two of the chairman of the committee. It is not clear in my mind what constitutes a long-term security and what constitutes a short-term security. Where does it begin and where does it end? Is it 3 years, 5 years, 10 years, or what?

Mr. MILLS. It is 5 years for long-term securities.

Mr. GROSS. Anything above 5 years?

Mr. MILLS. Anything below that does not now have a ceiling in law on interest. Only for 5 years and longer do you have the 4½ percent ceiling except the savings bonds, and that is 3.26.

Mr. GROSS. Is that because of the restriction on the interest rate, or what?

Mr. MILLS. No, sir; there are several different descriptions of Government obligations. A bond is a Government obligation of 5 years or longer. A bill may be for 90 days or 180 days; and so on. They have different descriptions of these various obligations, but we generally refer to the long-terms as 5 years and longer.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I find myself in a difficult spot on the issue of increasing interest rates. I have been trying to vote for economy; I have been trying to avert this kind of a situation. And I am saying to you here and now that again today in the House of Representatives we are dealing with an effect and not the cause. We will never stop this sort of thing until we deal with the cause, which is the spending of money we do not have and the piling up of debt. This legislation will be worse than meaningless unless we remove the root of the evil.

I recall when Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey resigned he said in effect, "I inherited a mess and I am leaving a mess." He was very frank about it, and every Member of this House knows that to raise interest rates, without squarely facing the issue of deficit spending and increasing debt, will only mean more inflation and a compounding of the Government's financial troubles.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. UTT].

Mr. UTT. Mr. Chairman, there is an item or two that I want to call to the attention of this House before this debate closes. In the first place, I want to know that this is not a family squabble. This is recognized as worldwide. They have newspapers in Japan, they have newspapers in West Germany and in France, and they know what we are doing here today.

Here is something that might make all of you feel very proud. I notice that Japanese bonds, 15-year bonds, are selling at $101. The 15-year American bonds are selling at $80. That is a nice situation. Belgian bonds are selling at 99 to 106. Those are 15-year bonds. American 15-year bonds of the same general issue are selling at 81. So the condition of the credit of the United States is recognized all over the world. Other countries recognize that they cannot get long-term money in the short-term market. They pay a higher interest rate in order to finance themselves over a long period. What we are actually doing, if we refuse to raise the interest rate on the long-term issue is to cause inflation that will cause a depreciation in the E- and H-bonds, which are held by 40 million American people. We simply say to them, "We are going to give you half a percent more if you will hold them instead of selling them or turning them back to the Government."

But for doing that, we are going to depreciate that dollar at least 5 or 10 percent over the next several years.

Mr. KASEM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UTT. I yield.

Mr. KASEM. Has the gentleman explored the cause as to why U.S. bonds are so far below par and are in such a disadvantageous position with all the other bonds of the major nations of the world?

Mr. UTT. Yes; I am very happy you asked me that because I was going to explain that in a minute. Every time we raise the cost of short-time money, the yield is higher. Therefore, the yield has got to be higher on longtime bonds and the value has got to go down in order to keep the yield up. So if you raise the interest rate on short-time bonds, to 5 percent, or 6 percent, or 7 percent, to which it may go, the value of the longtime bonds is going to depreciate from 5 to 10 points more in order to yield the same rate because, if you will follow the daily quotations, every time the interest on short-time money increases, the yields are higher and the yield has got to be higher on the longtime bonds, and they, in turn, have to depreciate in value in order to maintain the same yield.

Mr. KASEM. Might I not suggest then that the proper solution would be not to increase the yield on short-term obligations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. UTT. Of course, if you do not raise interest rates on short-time money, you just do not get the money. I go to a bank to borrow money and what they ask for the use of the money, I pay or I do not get my money. That is what the Treasury is going to find in the money market. With reference to that "sense of Congress" or "no sense of Congress" as it sometimes has been referred to in the national magazines, I want to say it is not what it says or what we believe it said, it is what the people in Paris, Japan, and Germany and London thought it meant, and they thought it meant a spiral of inflation. They own $13 billion worth of our bonds in these foreign countries, and they can redeem them in American gold at Fort Knox. They can come over here with a truck and go home with $13 billion in gold from Fort Knox, and then where is your gold reserve?

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this measure, and I want to indicate why. I endorse the arguments advanced by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

In supporting this, I still refuse to support the increase in interest on other long-term Government bonds. I think there are a number of significant differences.

I think we must differentiate between the E- and H-bonds and the long-term Government bonds.

In the first place, the E- and H-bonds are only bought, or almost exclusively, by individuals.

Therefore, they represent true savings and do not represent new money simply created by the banking system. At a time such as this, we should be particularly concerned to encourage true savings. This bill will have that effect.

Second. There can be no speculation in these bonds. They are not negotiable. It is individuals who buy the E- and H-bonds. No one can buy more than $10,000 worth in any one year. They can only be sold back to the Treasury. Consequently, they are sufficiently safeguarded so that the public is assured that no one will make any financial killing from the purchase or sale of these bonds.

Third. These bonds are publicly safeguarded against loss by those who buy the bonds. Some long-term Government bonds are now selling near 80, which means that the purchasers have taken a capital loss of approximately 20 percent, because of the failure of the administration and the Federal Reserve to fight inflation in the price of money—in interest rates.

Fourth. E- and H-bonds are pegged. It is interesting that the administration, which apparently opposes any other pegging of the market, has no objection to pegging the price of these bonds. The investors, therefore, are protected against losses arising from manipulation which raises the price of money and shrinks the value of the bonds. On the other hand, because the bonds are not negotiable, there can be no quick capital gain from the sale of such bonds at a later date when the interest rates fall.

Fifth. By providing additional encouragement to individuals to increase their purchases of Government bonds, we may relieve some of the pressure that the administration's hard-money policy has created and, therefore, permit an easing of the interest rate. The interest rate could be eased by changing the practices of the Federal Reserve, but since we do not seem to have any influence on that, we can at least offer some assistance here by approving this measure. But let's look at the consequences if we were ever to vote to approve the Treasury's request for unlimited-interest rates on long term Government bonds.

Assuming that the Treasury were to sell $10 billion of 40 year, 5 percent bonds, we would burden the taxpayers with a payment of $20 billion in interest over the life of the bonds without having paid off one dime on the original $10 billion of debt. Moreover, the interest rate will fall—in the not too distant future—to a reasonable long-term rate of around 2½ percent. The purchasers of such Government bonds would then stand to make an immediate capital gain approximately equal to their original investment because these bonds would gain in market value by almost $10 billion.

Every billion dollars of bonds sold, if the recommittal motion prevails, would be a giveaway of another billion dollars from the Treasury.

This would be the biggest robbery of the public Treasury ever performed in broad daylight with the consent of the Congress itself.

I cannot comprehend anyone in this House voting for what would be the biggest giveaway of this or any other administration by approving an increase in the long-term interest rate at this time.

I am firmly convinced that the present high interest rates are temporary and that it would be the height of folly to permit the Treasury now to commit generations yet unborn to long-term high-interest bonds, especially since these bonds may be nothing more than money created by the banks.

I will support the committee, but I am unalterably opposed to any motion to recommit with instructions to raise other long-term rates. We must protect the taxpayers against such a raid and against such a giveaway.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS].

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, this is a good bill. The interest rates on savings bonds should be enlarged. But the debate has centered on the whole question of the cardinal principle of the administration's economic policy: tight money and high interest rates.

It is a curious idea that a policy of high interest rates is the only way to fight inflation. High interest rates are inflation, just as are high prices for a suit of clothes or a house or a steel ingot. The higher you push interest rates or prices, the less economic activity you have. That is the way either one fights inflation.

It makes no sense to denounce someone who raises commodity prices as unpatriotic and inflationary, and praise someone who raises the price of money as patriotic and anti-inflationary.

My family has been in the banking business for over 100 years. The principle of banking which my father and grandfather followed was: Let us provide more and more loans, at lower and lower interest rates. The administration's principle is: Let us provide fewer and fewer loans, at higher and higher interest rates.

If the administration wants to fight inflation, let it present to Congress a fiscal program which plugs tax loopholes, and sees to it that we run a substantial surplus, permitting us to pay off a part of the national debt. That will bring interest rates down, and stop inflation in its tracks.

If the administration is concerned about stopping inflation, let it control the volume of consumer credit, now at an all-time high. Let it pay some attention to prices and wages in concentrated administered-price industries like the steel industry.

If the administration has the courage to come up with a real program for price stability and economic growth, I will vigorously support it. But its one-track, high-interest policy feeds inflation in the name of fighting it. It is high time the administration took a good look at its high-interest policy.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 11 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, we have had many important pieces of legislation before us during this session. In fact, the labor-management legislation we voted on and finally cleared earlier today was an extremely important piece of legislation; but in my personal view none of the matters we have considered have been as important to the welfare of this country as the piece of legislation that is presently before us. It is important not only to the present but to the future welfare of the people of our country and also to the people of the entire free world.

We are the greatest country on earth today. The integrity of the American dollar is of the utmost importance to us, but it is also of extreme importance in the free world. We have before us the matter of protecting the integrity of our currency, of the dollar, which is looked to by all of the free nations of the world.

I regret, frankly, that the committee on which I serve, the Committee on Ways and Means, has turned its back upon the most pressing and important problem facing the Nation today, that matter of protecting the integrity of the American dollar and the credit of our country. Our action today will directly involve the fiscal stability of this country and the economic strength of the Nation.

Let me call your attention to a statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not think there is an individual on either side of this aisle who questions the ability, the capacity, and the integrity of the present Secretary of the Treasury; in fact, I was most pleased to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS]. Although he took issue with Mr. Martin, of the Federal Reserve Board, he paid a compliment to Secretary of the Treasury Anderson, and recognized his ability and his integrity. Let me quote to you what the Secretary of the Treasury said as recently as August 18:

> We have tried to make it clear that under present restrictions the Government in the management of the debt can actively contribute to inflationary pressures by being confined to short-term financing, which, the shorter it gets, is more nearly like money.
> We have tried to make it clear that the Government has a dual responsibility to 40 million savings bonds holders. First we should see to it that they get a fair return on their savings.

The bill reported by the committee dealing with E- and H-bonds will enable the Secretary to carry out this responsibility. But note what else the Secretary said:

> And, second, we should take such actions as will help guarantee their savings against loss in the purchasing power of the invested dollar.

Further he said:

> We have tried to make it clear that vital to the security of the free world is the maintenance of international confidence in our collective resolve to maintain sound financial systems. Because of our position as a leader in this community of nations, many countries hold large dollar deposits with us and have large investments in our securities. They have therefore a real concern in the way in which the United States manages its financial affairs. In asking to have the artificial restrictions removed from our debt management legislation, we seek to assure the people both at home and abroad that we will manage the debt in a way consistent with the preservation of the dollar as an international standard of value.

Mr. Chairman, when we refuse to accede to the request of the Secretary of the Treasury that he be given the tools with which to manage our national debt, we are not acting "consistent with the preservation of the dollar as a national standard of value." Let us recognize that we have today a debt approaching $290 billion. During the coming year we will have to go into the market to finance or to refinance between $76 billion and $100 billion of that debt, almost one-third of it has to be refinanced. We have to go into the market and find somebody who will lend us the money. The question before us is, How is this financing to be done? Are we going to give the President and the Secretary of the Treasury the tools to manage that debt and borrow that amount of money in a sound, economical manner?

Let me point out to you that this is not a matter of giving something to the present Secretary of the Treasury or giving something to the present President of the United States, in other words, doing a favor for them. It is a matter of doing ourselves a favor. How that debt is managed will determine what the dollars we earn today or earn tomorrow, or the investments which we have in savings or pensions or anything else, will amount to. This is not some favor you are doing for a Secretary of the Treasury or a President. Whether he be a Republican Secretary of the Treasury or a Republican President or a Democratic Secretary or a Democratic President, I have confidence they are going to do what they think is best in the management of the debt, best for the interests of the country. One thing I am not going to do is be a party to restricting them and tying their hands, saying, "No, you cannot do what you feel is necessary to preserve the integrity of our dollar and of our savings." Yet that is the attitude being taken by the Democrat majority on the Ways and Means Committee in its refusal to lift the interest ceiling on long-term marketable securities.

The motion to recommit, which will be offered by the minority, proposes that the Secretary of the Treasury be given the tools which he says he needs, and he says any other Secretary would need to properly manage the debt.

In the motion to recommit we will ask that he be given the tools to properly manage the debt because under the committee bill the most important tool is denied him. He is not able to go into the long-term market for at least some of this financing, or some of this $78 billion to $100 billion he must borrow.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLS. Is it not true that the committee bill before the House does contain this provision for the long-term debt?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. There is a technical provision providing for refinancing turnover.

Mr. MILLS. Would not that be helpful with respect to the bond values?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. To some degree but very insignificant, I would say to the chairman, as compared to putting the Secretary of the Treasury in a position where he can look to all of the potential money markets to see at the particular time, which is the most desirable from the standpoint of the economic management of this debt.

You still restrict him exclusively to short-term bonds of under 5 years. You require him to compete in the money market with the very people that you say you want to protect from high interest rate. It is to this short-term market that your average constituent must go when he needs to borrow to buy a car, or a refrigerator. It is where your small merchant must go to borrow for his inventory. Yes, the borrowings by the average person who needs money is for a period of under 5 years, the short-term.

Unless you give the Secretary of the Treasury authority to go into the long-term market, as we will ask in the motion to recommit, you force him into the short-term market to compete with these people and forcing the price these little people must pay for their money up through the ceiling.

Mark my word—if you refuse to let the Secretary look to the long-term as well as the short-term market for the borrowing that we know he must do, you will force a further increase in the interest rate that the average person in this country will have to pay on borrowed money. You will also further increase the cost to the Government in carrying our huge national debt.

You will complain next year, just as you complain now, about the cost of carrying the debt. Just remember that your refusal to face up to the facts of life today will make that cost even higher tomorrow.

You have nothing to lose; you have everything to gain by voting today to give the Secretary of the Treasury the authority he needs to manage the debt. I plead with you to be reasonable and responsible and vote for the motion to recommit.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time on this side to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. METCALF].

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Chairman, like the other members of the committee, I am supporting H.R. 9035 to give the President authority to increase the rate of interest on E- and H-bonds. Since 1958 redemptions have exceeded sales in every month. In 1959 monthly sales have decreased every month. This bill will reverse the trend and put more of the national debt into the hands of the people of America.

Now, in the remaining time I have I want to touch on the part of the package that the President is insisting upon and, we are told, is going to be part of the motion to recommit with instructions to be offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON] to increase interest rates on long-term bonds; to take the present ceiling of 4¼ percent off. Last week President Eisenhower vetoed the public works appropriation bill. In his veto message he said, "Although the cost of the unbudgeted items will be relatively small in 1960, about $50 million, their ultimate cost will be more than $800 million." Now, more than $200 million of those unbudgeted items were reclamation projects that will repay the Treasury every cent of the cost. At the same time, the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the President are proposing an increase in interest rates on long-term bonds that may eventually cost the taxpayers many times $800 million. The public debt in June was almost $282 billion. One-fourth of 1 percent interest on $1 billion is $2.5 million a year. For every $1 million of bonds issued at one-fourth of 1 percent over the present limit for a period of 20 years, the additional cost to the taxpayers will be $50 million. If the $53 billion of Treasury borrowing that is coming due between now and December 1960 is refinanced on long-term 20-year bonds at a rate of only one-quarter of 1 percent over the present limit, the eventual cost to the taxpayers would be $2.6 billion. If the rate goes up a full percent, 1 whole percent, the increased interest would be $10.6 billion.

The Republican administration repeatedly says it is against spending. President Eisenhower has twice vetoed housing bills as extravagant and inflationary. Secretary Flemming has said that the President will veto any bill for aid to education that costs more than $25 million annually. I have already mentioned the public works veto. And yet there is an area where this Republican administration will spend and spend and spend. This is the spendingest administration in history insofar as interest is concerned. The cost of carrying the public debt has gone from $5.8 billion annually in 1952 to $8.6 billion in 1959. In January the estimated interest charge on the public debt was $8.1 billion. Now, because of the interest increases in the last 8 months the estimate has gone up another half a billion dollars. The extra money spent for interest in the last 6½ years would have built all the classrooms we need; would have built all the hospitals we need; would have provided all the public housing we have asked for, and left some money over for area redevelopment. The maximum rate of interest at 4¼ percent was fixed in 1917. We have had this maximum rate ever since then. When the administration asked us to change, to take the ceiling off, the members of the Committee on Ways and Means listened. We listened with some approval, but because of the mismanagement of the public debt by this administration, we felt that if we took the interest rate ceiling off, we should have a mild admonition to the Federal Reserve System "to assist in economical and efficient management of the public debt." Now, that is the objectionable resolution that was ordered; that is the objectionable sense of Congress resolution, that the Federal Reserve System assist in economical and efficient management of the public debt.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. METCALF. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. The gentleman knows that those words, that kind of a sense resolution is contained in the motion to recommit to be made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. METCALF. I am reading from the sense of Congress resolution that I offered as an amendment and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania characterized as objectionable.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Those are only a few words taken out of it.

Mr. METCALF. We already have the tools for the management of this public debt. All that the Democratic members of the committee that adopted this sense of Congress resolution wanted was to insist that the Federal Reserve System use the tools that were already available.

Let us see about this management of the public debt since 1917. Since then the Treasury has operated within the interest rate ceiling, through World War I, through the boom of the late twenties, through the great depression, through World War II and the Korean war and down to date. In World War II the national debt rose from $45 billion to $270 billion and there was no need to increase interest rates.

Twice President Eisenhower has campaigned on a platform of defending the dollar. Yet the most spectacular failure of this administration has been its monetary policy. When Secretary Humphrey assumed office as Secretary of the Treasury, he announced that it would be his policy to attempt to get more of the debt into long-term securities. The average maturity of Government bonds at the end of 1952 was 5 years, 8 months. After 6 years effort in getting the debt into long-term securities this has declined to an average of 4 years, 7 months in June 1959. In 1952 yields on long-term Government bonds had fluctuated around 2.75 percent. One of Humphrey's first actions was in April 1953 when he offered a long-term issue at 3¼ percent. Immediately after his offering of bonds at a rate on one-half of 1 percent above the market, all other interest rates went up, and by June of 1953 the average yield on long terms had been driven up to 3.1 percent. Secretary Humphrey has always been a high-interest man. Four years ago, while still Secretary of the Treasury, he told the financial editor of the Christian Science Monitor, "Why, I can remember when 7 percent interest was normal. We thought nothing of it."

When the hearings were held on this bill I asked Governor Martin where the interest rate would go, if we raised the ceiling on the 4¼-percent long-term bonds. He said he could not tell me. I asked him if it would go up 1 percent. He said he could not tell me, he did not know. Perhaps they desire that it go as high as Secretary Humphrey remembers and think nothing of it, an interest rate of 7 percent.

This administration's answer to every fiscal problem in fiscal management has been higher interest rates and nothing succeeds in fiscal management in this administration like failure.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. METCALF. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAYS. Is not the reason for that because higher interest rates help the big contributors to the Republican Party?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. METCALF. I yield.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is supporting the bill today because they are raising the interest rate. Where is the consistency of his argument?

Mr. METCALF. The consistency is that as a result of this incredible mismanagement of the financial and fiscal policy of the Government, in order to get some of the debt into the hands of the small investor we have to increase the interest rate on E and H bonds.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. So the gentleman does favor an increase in interest rates?

Mr. METCALF. Yes. But I say we do not have to increase interest rates on the long-term securities. Higher interest rates is to this Republican administration like a shot of penicillin; it will cure any ill.

So we are told today, after almost 7 years of mismanagement, that we cannot sell long-term bonds at the legal rate. One reason that long-term bonds cannot be sold is that the administration has created an expectation and anticipation that interest rates will be higher.

This has caused investors and the banks to hold off purchase lest they suffer a capital loss. The way to answer this is for Congress to take a firm stand and refuse to raise the legal limit and these anticipations will no longer affect the market. The other reason is that the administration is not disposed to put into effect a genuine anti-inflation policy and the financial community is aware of this. This is no time to compound past errors and present inadequacy by a further increase in interest notes.

I urge you to vote against the motion to recommit.

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Chairman, before the House takes action on the motion now under consideration, I think it important that all members realize the real issue involved. Assuredly, it is not merely the issue of increasing interest rates on series E and H savings bonds. Rather, the real issue will be presented in the recommittal motion to remove the ceiling on interest rates for long-term Government securities.

We have heard a great many pious statements in support of increased interest rates. But behind this facade lies one of the most unconscionable giveaway schemes with which this or any other Congress has ever been presented.

Let us not forget that the so-called interest rate crisis has been created by a premeditated, calculated Government policy. A change in this policy by the President and by the Secretary of the Treasury can relieve our present interest rate problems.

Before casting a vote in favor of the recommittal motion, I would ask my colleagues to consider the following facts:

First. No long-term Government bonds fall due for more than a year.

Second. The Government already has full authority to issue short-term securities without any interest rate restrictions. Such short-term securities may be issued for a period up to 5 years.

Third. Interest rates on long-term and short-term bonds have remained virtually the same, with very little spread between them.

Fourth. If conversion to long-term securities is so important, why was not this conversion made last year? Within the past year, the Government could have sold almost unlimited amounts of Federal long-term securities at 2⅝ percent interest.

Fifth. By initiating a revised fiscal policy, the present Administration could remedy current problems besetting the long-term bond market.

Sixth. If long-term Government securities went to 5 percent interest the housing, farm mortgage, and small business loan programs would come to a dead end.

Mr. Chairman, I have labeled this attempt to remove the ceiling on interest rates a "giveaway." I believe this is correct terminology for let us remember that the Goverment, armed with this legislation, could finance during the next few years up to $100 billion of the national debt at interest rates of 5 percent or more. Let us also bear in mind that average long-term bond rates have been maintained at an average of 2½ percent for many decades. There is no reason to believe that, with a return to sound monetary policies, long-term rates would not return to that figure. Imagine the staggering bonanza to the big financial interests of the country at the expense of the taxpayers of the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to vote against the recommittal motion that will be offered.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the bill now before the Committee. This legislation has received the careful and intensive consideration of the Committee on Ways and Means and has been reported to the House after the most careful and thorough study. The Committee on Ways and Means, as has been so ably explained by our esteemed and respected chairman, explored in detail the many aspects and ramifications of the recommendations which were made by the President, and also by the Secretary of the Treasury during the course of the public hearings. The Ways and Means Committee concluded that action was appropriate and necessary in this area relating to the U.S. savings bond program.

As we all know, savings bonds, since the initiation of the program in 1935 have constituted a significant portion of our Federal public debt. The importance of maintaining an appropriate segment of the public debt in the form of savings bonds held by thousands of millions of small individual investors across the Nation is generally recognized. I therefore need not here add my comments to those who have preceded me on this phase of the matter.

It is, however, clear that since the end of World War II the public appeal of savings bonds has been considerably reduced even though the rate of return on these bonds, when held to maturity, has at times equaled or exceeded that paid by mutual savings banks and commercial banks on savings deposits and by most savings and loan associations on share accounts.

The point that I should like to emphasize, Mr. Chairman, is that the area of the money market which is available to the sale of United States savings bonds is a relatively limited area and competition within that area for the savings dollar is intense. There are in fact four principal competitors within this area: mutual savings banks, savings and loan associations, and thrift accounts of commercial savings banks, and the Government savings bond program. These are the competing institutions which scramble for the available dollars in competition with our savings bond program in this area.

There has been within the past several years a traditional and historical balance between the rate of interest payable by the several institutions in this area. As Members will recall, due to the adverse position of the Treasury competitively in 1957 with respect to the savings bond program, the Congress enacted legislation designed to permit the Treasury Department to restore the competitive position of savings bonds with other comparable forms of saving without causing any significant change in the then present distribution of investments. The 3¼-percent series E bond was first offered to the public in February 1957 following enactment of this legislation. Since that time yields of U.S. Government securities have advanced by at least one-half of 1 percent and rates on newly offered issues of corporate and State and municipal securities have also advanced during the intervening period. At the same time the U.S. savings bond program has been slipping badly and in recent months the rate of redemptions on series E and H savings bonds has increased steeply. In fact, for the past several years, with the exception of the first quarter of 1958, redemptions on series E and H bonds have continually exceeded cash sales of these bonds. Following the legislation enacted in 1957 the sales on E and H bonds improved somewhat and redemptions declined significantly. However, in 1959 the sales of series E and H savings bonds have declined by 10 percent in the first 8 months with the downward trend of sales steepening in recent months. In addition, the 1959 redemptions through August were 13 percent above a year ago with the trend also worsening.

The Committee on Ways and Means was advised that during the month of July 1959, the excess of redemptions of sales of E and H bonds amounted to $156 million, the largest amount in any month since April 1946.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, and I cannot emphasize too strongly, there is a very delicate competitive balance which should be maintained between the several comparable forms of savings competing for the money available in this area of investment. These savings bonds are competing with savings and loan shares, mutual savings bank deposits, and commercial bank savings deposits. The customary and historical balance and the traditional position as between these several forms of savings should and must be maintained.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, I should point out here that the New York State Banking Board, only about a month ago, placed a limit of 3½ percent on the regular and annual dividend rate that mutual savings banks can pay depositors, although the board also took action to permit banks to pay a special additional dividend beginning next year of one-fourth of 1 percent on savings which have been on deposit for at least 2 years. I may say here that the action of the New York State Banking Board bears a close relationship to the situation which has existed within the past several months following the recommendations of Secretary Anderson with respect to the U.S. savings bond program.

Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the committee is designed to permit the Treasury to restore the competitive position of the savings bonds and thus will contribute to proper debt management and will afford protection to the purchasers of this form of investment. The role of savings bonds in Federal debt management is a significant one. We in the Congress should give to the Secretary of the Treasury the flexibility which he needs in order to sustain the savings bond program and to maintain its traditional and historical competitive position.

Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of the bill now before the committee, and I shall oppose the motion which will be offered to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. ANDERSON of Montana. Mr. Chairman, the most inflationary influence in our economy today is the administration's high interest policy. In a Nation whose tremendous economic production and whose high standard of living is a result of contributions of natural resources, of manpower, and particularly of capital investment, it is obvious that the interest rate paid for capital is directly reflected in the costs of production. Whereas costs of labor have advanced very little since 1952, and whereas the costs of those raw materials produced from our natural resources have actually been reduced since 1952, the level of interest rates has increased anywhere from 50 to 80 percent.

This inflationary result of the high interest policy is shown most strikingly in the interest on the national debt, where interest charges have gone from $4.7 billion in 1946 to $8.6 billion in 1958, or an increase of 80 percent.

The way to cope with inflation is to reduce, not increase, interest rates, and to make available sufficient supplies of currency and of credit to encourage our free enterprise economy to expand production. Through the workings of our competitive economy this will result in a lowered level of the cost of living and a higher standard of living.

The proposal before us this afternoon to increase the interest rate on savings bonds may be justified by saying that in view of the fact that this administration has succeeded in tremendously increasing interest rates on all other forms of capital investment, it is unfair that investors in savings bonds should not be offered an increase in interest. For that reason, I shall vote to permit an increase in savings bonds interest, but exceedingly reluctantly and only in the face of the fait accompli of the greatly inflated level of interest charges accomplished by the Republican administration.

I am serving final and definite warning that if any move is made today or any other day, in this session or any other session, to remove the 4¼-percent-interest-rate ceiling on long-term Treasury bonds, I shall fight the proposal to the last ditch. We have heard a lot of slogans about "creeping inflation" and "spiraling inflation" and "another step up the staircase of inflation," but a move to remove the 4¼-percent-interest-rate ceiling on long-term Treasury bonds would literally be a 12-foot-high step up an enormous ladder of inflation, one whose effect could not be ameliorated for perhaps a generation.

If we permit the administration at this time, when no long-term debt obligations are coming due, to refinance the expiring short-term obligations in the form of high-interest, long-term obligations, then we are simply writing blank checks to the big investors in the million dollar Government bond issues. It has been estimated that these checks would be filled out over the next 20 to 40 years for sums that would total anywhere from five to fifteen billions of dollars, checks that would have to be paid by your children and mine. If any move is made today to recommit, with instructions to include removal of the 4¼-percent-interest-rate ceiling, or if any bill is introduced or brought to the floor in this session, or in the next session. I would hope that every one of my Democratic colleagues who oppose inflation and oppose the strangling grip of high-interest money upon our economic growth, will arise to strike it down; and I would hope that those of our Republican colleagues who truly believe in fiscal responsibility would join us in our fight against the inflation of exorbitant high interest rates.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Chairman, I want to state clearly that because I have voted for an increase in the interest rates on E and H bonds, this does not mean that I am in favor of raising interest rates across the board. I am stating further that if next spring the administration comes in with a proposal to raise the interest rates of other bonds, I shall oppose it. The fact that we are faced with the necessity of raising interest rates in order to attract people to buy the greatest security in the world is indicative of the financial boondoggling of the incumbent administration.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, there are no committee amendments.

PROGRAM FOR THE BALANCE OF THE WEEK AND FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for this time in order to inquire of the majority leader concerning the program for the rest of the week and for next week.

Mr. McCORMACK. While we shall meet tomorrow, there is no legislative business on the program and Members may govern themselves accordingly.

If the extension of Public Law 480 should pass the Senate today, we want to meet in order to send that bill to conference. However, there will be no rollcalls and no legislative matters so that Members may make their own arrangements accordingly. I make this statement so Members will know and they know that I will protect them.

On Monday we have the Consent Calendar.

Then there are five suspensions.

S. 601, construction of the Bardwell Reservoir.

House Joint Resolution 352, to authorize a study, Library of Congress, additional building.

H.R. 8343, acquisition of cropland by eminent domain.

H.R. 5196, Federal employees per diem allowances.

H.R. 7758. Oversea Differentials and Allowances Act.

If there are any other bills on which the Speaker is going to recognize to suspend the rules—and I do not know of any at the moment—but, if any should arise, I will announce that tomorrow.

On Tuesday, the Private Calendar will be called, and when we are in the House I will ask unanimous consent that the Private Calendar be called on Tuesday.

Then there is the public works appropriation bill for 1960.

The only other bill that I can announce now, so far as Tuesday and the rest of the week is concerned, is the bill S. 2208, the Federal airport funds for Alaska and Hawaii.

Mr. ARENDS. In keeping with the agreement that has been entered into, there will be no rollcalls on Monday?

Mr. McCORMACK. There will be no rollcalls on Monday. That has already been done by unanimous consent.

There is the usual reservation that any further program will be announced later.

Of course, conference reports may be brought up at any time.

Of course, next week is a very busy week and the Members will be subject to immediate action on matters, and I may not be able to give notice to Members as long in advance of a bill coming out as I have been able to give during the session to date.

Mr. ARENDS. I might say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that some of us are anxiously waiting as to whether or not there is such a thing as a sine die adjournment listed there anyplace.

Mr. McCORMACK. Nobody is more anxious for that than I am. We have had a long session; in fact, one of the longest in the history of the country. I have no further comment to make except to say, certainly, the people of the country appreciate the fact that we personally as Members of the Congress and the members of our families are entitled to consideration and a vacation. We certainly have had a very long session and, while I will not enumerate the accomplishments of this session of the Congress, under the most trying circumstances, we have had a very effective democratic session.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. UDALL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 9035) to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 376, he reported the same back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman qualifies.

The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania moves to recommit the bill (H.R. 9035) to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the same to the House forthwith with amendments as follows:

Page 1, strike out line 7 and all that follows through line 4 on page 2, and insert:

"SEC. 25. In the case of any offering of bonds issued or to be issued under this Act, the maximum limits on the interest rate or the investment yield or both may be exceeded upon a finding by the President with respect to such offering that the national interest requires that such maximum limits be exceeded.

"(b) It is the sense of the Congress that the monetary and debt management officials of the Government shall, in discharging their responsibilities, take fully into account the importance of promoting continuity of employment opportunities, achieving the maximum sustainable rate of economic growth, maintaining reasonable stability in the purchasing power of the dollar, and assuring that the cost of servicing the public debt is kept to the minimum, consistent with these vital national objectives."

Page 2, strike out line 21 and all that follows through line 4 on page 3, and insert:

"(d)(1) The amendments made by subsections (a) and (c) shall apply only to offerings made during the three-year period which begins on the date of the enactment of this Act and only—

"(A) to bonds issued during such three-year period, and

"(B) to bonds issued under section 22 of the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, before the date of the enactment of this Act.

"(2) In no case shall the interest rate, or investment yield, on any bond be changed pursuant to the amendments made by this title for any period which begins before June 1, 1959."

Amend the title so as to read: "To facilitate management of the public debt, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be without recognition of gain or loss for income tax purposes, and for other purposes."

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania (during the reading of the motion to recommit). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the motion be dispensed with since it has been discussed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced in the opinion of the Chair, the noes had it.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 133, nays 256, not voting 46, as follows:

GEORGE W. POTTER

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, on August 10 last the State of Rhode Island lost a keen observer and fairminded interpreter of State, national, and international affairs in the death of George W. Potter, former chief editorial writer of the Providence Journal and the Evening Bulletin.

I knew George Potter, and one of the things that struck me most about him was his love of people. Writer and scholar though he was, his everyday interest in his fellow man, in his foibles, his achievements, and his yearnings, was what impressed me most.

One article appearing after his death said:

Books, documents, and people were all alike to him, and of the three he had the most affinity for people.

"I don't care what you say, you've got to get to the people. They're smarter than anybody," he often quipped, but seriously.

Another said:

He was a man of omniverous interests; everything from classical music to horseracing fascinated him. The common denominator was people. His own lovable personality made it natural for all kinds of men and women to respond to his warm, affectionate interest in them; scarcely a day went by that he did not make a new friend. To use a phrase he himself liked to employ occasionally, he was truly a sweet person.

Mr. Speaker, it is the people who sent us to this House of Representatives. Here in this House the problems with which we deal are the problems of people, their security, and their aspirations. The more we mingle with people, the more we listen to people, the more we like people, the more, in short, we behave in the pattern of the George Potters of the world, the better, I am sure, we will handle those problems.

In closing I would like to include the following articles which appeared in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, expressing the high regard in which George Potter was held by everyone who knew him:

[From the Providence (R.I.) Journal Aug. 10, 1959]

GEORGE POTTER DIES—JOURNAL EDITORIALIST

George W. Potter, 59, Pulitzer Prize winning editorial writer for the Providence Journal-Bulletin, died early today at Miriam Hospital after suffering a heart attack.

George Potter had won honor as a scholar, newspaperman and writer, but he was one of the first editorial writers in Providence to destroy the concept that editorial thinking belongs in an ivory tower.

Books, documents and people were all alike to him, and of the three he had the most affinity for people.

"I don't care what you say, you've got to get to the people. They're smarter than anybody," he often quipped, but seriously.

George had won the Pulitzer Prize in 1945 for a 1944 editorial discussing the deep relation of freedoms, human and economic, and their relation to the press as a safeguard of true freedoms.

A year later Brown University awarded him the honorary degree of doctor of literature. In 1955 he was made honorary member of Phi Beta Kappa scholastic society, and in the same year Durfee Technical Institute in his native Fall River gave him an honorary master's degree.

But before these honors had come to him, George had made a significant contribution to newspaperdom in the community.

He had come to Providence to go to Brown University, where he was graduated in 1921. His home had been Fall River, a city which in the early 1920's was full of fierce newspaper competition, and whose residents had as much savvy as in any city in America, arising from its hot political, labor, economic and church leaders.

George's father, Joseph H. Potter, Jr., was a Durfee mill superintendent who had first gone to work in the mills as a youngster of 9 in New Hampshire, graduated to the bowler-hat which characterized the millman who rose from the ranks, and died in 1910. His mother, Ellen L. Potter, was one of three Irish girls who had emigrated to this country as a young girl.

Even while attending B.M.C. Durfee High School, and later as a student at Brown, he developed an insatiable belief in the newspaper as an institution of truth.

At Brown, where he won the Hicks prize for 4 years of the highest standing in English literature, he worked as correspondent for the old Providence Tribune. He corresponded for the New Bedford Times and the Fall River Herald, and for 2 years after he was graduated, he plowed a beat for those newspapers.

In New Bedford, Fall River, and Providence in those days most public communication was on the street. George fast learned to talk and listen, and his faith in the fundamental rightness of ordinary people grew.

The Providence Tribune hired him in 1923 as an editorial writer. George was then working also as an assistant in the English department at Brown. For nearly 15 years thereafter he also conducted the extension course in journalism on the Hill, a course in which makeup and headlines had little part, but writing good English counted most.

While at the Tribune, in the Dwyer-Barry era of that offbeat Republican paper, he became associate editor, and finally succeeded Fred Luther as editor.

Sevellon Brown, late editor and publisher of the Journal-Bulletin, picked George in 1929 as one of several "down the street" men he wanted on his staff when the Tribune was bought by Peter G. Gerry, owner of the Democratic Providence News.

He was chosen at a time when the editorial staff of the Journal-Bulletin was being expanded into a group of men from assorted backgrounds, geographical areas, and scholarly interests. The purpose was to create an editorial staff whose members would be a sounding board and a forum of every possible view and horizon, so that the newspaper's considered editorial policies would be removed from individualism, whim or personal animus.

George's field of interest for many years was that of international affairs, and history. Yet he contributed as much from his insight in local people, politics and economics as from his own studies.

He was made chief editorial writer for some years in 1939, succeeding the late Henry R. Palmer.

In all this time he not only preached to other newspapermen that they always must remember the concept of news beats, be they city halls, courts, police stations, public libraries, histories of diplomacy or civilization, or just street corners, a trolley or bus trip, or even a saloon.

He also was an assiduous notetaker of all he heard and read, because he believed any writer had to relate the world as he saw it to his study.

In the late 1940's George began to submerge himself into a college-time entrancement with the Irish literary renascence. Especially as it had been encouraged in the 1880's by the late Alfred M. Williams, then editor of the Journal, who had first encouraged in this country such literary greats as Yeats, A. E. Synge, and the rest.

The result was that in 1949 the Journal-Bulletin commissioned George to go to Ireland to secure more scholarly evidence of the part the Journal played in those days in spreading to the world the writings of the Irish dramatists, poets and story writers of the late 19th century.

Offshoot of this was the establishment of the Williams collection in the Providence Public Library, unique in this country.

Later, when it became apparent that George was amassing a wealth of evidence about Irish culture in America, the Guggenheim Foundation in 1956 awarded him a year's fellowship abroad to learn all he could about the bases of Irish immigration, and the history of the Catholic Irish in America between 1820 and 1860. It was a field strangely neglected by other historians.

After several years of monumental research poring through old records and newspapers and talking to countless Irish historians, George finally produced the results of his work in a book.

He was a member of the board of trustees of the Williams collection, a member of the board of editors of the Brown Alumni Monthly, member of Phi Kappa fraternity and the Sphinx and Pi Kappa societies at Brown and had lectured at the Columbia Press Institute.

For many years George had lived in one of the quietest spots possible in Providence, a cottage at 30 Mount Avenue that was a part of the Cole farm. Until recent years, in fact, cows had browsed under his window as he sat and read books, newspapers and microfilm records at home.

While he never lost his affection for the people he met and knew by the thousands on downtown streets, he liked to escape in the summer to Nantucket or Cuttyhunk Islands. Even on his trips to Ireland, he gravitated instinctively to it as an island, remote from European civilization and politics, and closest to the West.

He leaves his wife, the former Erna Dingwell, of New Bedford; a sister Mary D. Potter, of Boston; and two brothers, Joseph H. and James F. Potter.

Mr. and Mrs. Potter had no children.

[From the Providence (R.I.) Journal, Aug. 11, 1959]

GEORGE W. POTTER: EDITORIALIST, SCHOLAR, AND FRIEND

The death of George W. Potter marks the end of an era in the history of these newspapers as an institution. For those of us who have worked with him and known him intimately over the years, it is an event of profound sadness.

As a foremost contributor to these columns for some 30 years, Mr. Potter was the last active writer on an editorial staff assembled in the late 1920's. All of them now are dead or in retirement. Yet he himself would be the first to insist that the editorial voice of the Journal-Bulletin must and will endure, through the changing generations, for George Potter, had a deep interest in the vital function of the American press generally and a unique understanding of the institutional quality of his own newspaper.

However the fullness of a life may be measured—by achievements, by friendships, by the truths a man believes in and expresses—by all of these standards, George Potter lived a full life though he died at 59. He was a man of omniverous interests; everything from classical music to horseracing fascinated him. The common denominator was people. His own lovable personality made it natural for all kinds of men and women to respond to his warm, affectionate interest in them; scarcely a day went by that he did not make a new friend. To use a phrase he himself likes to employ occasionally, "he was truly a sweet person."

But Mr. Potter never let understanding or affection get in the way of a sure appreciation of men, manners and events. He had no patience with intellectual dishonesty, in people or in institutions. A wry, kindly, gently prodding observer of the human parade here and around the world, he kept before the Rhode Island he loved a sense of continuity by dipping into history for parallels with the news of the day.

Primarily a stylist among newspapermen, Mr. Potter became in later years principally a scholar, largely through his consuming interest in the history of the Irish in America. In both capacities, sometimes in the face of handicaps and adversity, he gained conspicuous professional success, as evidenced by his winning of a Pulitzer Prize for editorial writing in 1945 and by his later achievement of a Guggenheim fellowship to pursue his historical research. Brown University, his alma mater, gave him an honorary doctorate in 1946. These and other honors came to him, and he wore them modestly.

Commenting editorially on such a personality and so dear a friend as George Potter is infinitely difficult. Again, he himself would be the first to recognize this. As an oldtime editorial writer, perhaps therefore he would forgive his colleagues for the inadequacy of this attempt to say simply that we shall miss him.

[From the Providence (R.I.) Sunday Journal, Aug. 16, 1959]

LIBRARY BOARD PAYS TRIBUTE TO GEORGE POTTER

The board of trustees and staff of the Providence Public Library were deeply saddened by the death of George W. Potter, editorial writer for the Providence Journal-Bulletin, and a warm and valuable friend of this library.

Many a librarian's day was brightened by his frequent visits and by his enthusiasm when a newly uncovered bit of evidence added another facet to his researches on Irish history. He often spoke and wrote of his indebtedness for the richness of Providence libraries, and once observed that the unique personality of Providence was due to the existence of Brown University, the Providence Journal, and the Providence Public Library. To these institutions he was earnestly devoted.

He will be chiefly remembered at the library for assisting the staff in establishing the Alfred M. Williams Memorial on Irish Culture just 10 years ago. Mr. Potter had then returned from a pilgrimage to Ireland, and, with the support of Sevelion Brown, then editor and publisher of the Journal, he helped to formulate plans for building a center of Irish studies in the library.

His own words best express the purpose of the endeavor: "While scholarly pursuits will be encouraged and aided, the hope is that the memorial will be used by all the people of Providence to widen and extend the cultural life of the community."

Providence had long been aware of Douglas Hyde, Katherine Tynan, William Butler Yeats, John Todhunter, and other writers associated with the Irish literary renaissance. Some of their works had been published in the Providence Journal by its editor, Alfred M. Williams, thereby giving that newspaper a "sort of left-handed immortality," as Mr. Potter expressed it.

After the establishment of the Memorial in 1949, Mr. Potter drew attention to the growing collection of books by inviting such distinguished visitors as Padraic Colum, Irish poet, novelist, and folklorist; Dr. Richard J. Hayes, director of the National Library of Ireland; William Howard Taft III, former U.S. Ambassador to Ireland; and John J. Hearne, Eire's Ambassador to the United States.

He encouraged local Irish societies, individuals and The Providence Journal to enrich the collection by presenting gifts of cash. The Swiss reproduction of the Book of Kells, a scarce original of the Easter Rebellion Proclamation, Irish street ballads and the Charles James Fox collection of over 400 pamphlets containing raw material for the study of 18th and 19th century Ireland—these and many other gifts were stimulated by his zeal. His gentle needling of the staff to purchase desirable items from bookseller's catalogs was another method of building the collection to one of significance in this country.

The library staff will remember him with affection, and the Irish Collection, which he named for a predecessor, will always be thought of as a memorial to George W. Potter.

STUART C. SHERMAN,
Librarian, Providence Public Library.
PROVIDENCE.

PUBLIC WORKS APPROPRIATION BILL

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. THOMSON] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, I take this special order as a member of the Appropriations Committee, to attempt to put in focus the situation pertaining to the public works appropriation bill. I hope that what I have to say will be of assistance, for the situation definitely needs to be brought into focus in order, first, to resolve the deadlock that appears to exist between the Congress and the Executive; second to present the facts to the members not on the committee, so that they can cast an informed vote when called upon to act; and third, to advise the people of this country of the true situation.

In the first place, the veto of the bill by the President was unfortunate. For this, I do not blame the President. At the time it was being considered, he was occupied with most important questions of foreign policy vital to the peace and security of this Nation and of the world. As a matter of fact, when the veto was delivered, he was out of the country and had been for some time.

This did not permit those who really knew the true situation to consult with him or for him to consult with them. The President was denied the advice of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN], who is ranking Republican member of the subcommittee which considered the bill, is best informed, and has time and again proved that he is really an economy Congressman, resulting in savings of billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money.

The real blame must rest on the shoulders of those who gave the President the wrong basic information, as reflected by his veto message. One can make a wise decision only as he has the correct information on which to base it. The veto of the bill was based upon wrong information and was ill considered, because it does not bring about true economy and because without at least some of the projects objected to by the President, we will not be meeting the responsibilities of both the executive and the legislative to provide for the orderly and sound development of the water resources of this Nation.

We must provide for the economic strength and growth of our country if we are to act with responsibility. Irresponsible cuts are no more economy than irresponsible spending. Proper water development is a must if this is to be done.

The President has repeatedly recognized this. His own Cabinet Committee reported such, stressing the needs for increased water supply to meet the growing needs of the Nation. The Hoover Commission stated:

Economic development and conservation of water resources is vital to the future of the United States.

At this point I insert some pertinent quotes from the President, his Cabinet Committee's report, and the Hoover Commission report:

THE PRESIDENTIAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON WATER RESOURCES POLICY—DECEMBER 22, 1955

1. SUMMARY

A sound water policy must look toward an adequate supply of water for our people, prevent waste, reduce water pollution to its lowest practical level, provide means for the best and most effective distribution of water, improve navigation, and take steps to check the destructive forces of water which destroy land, property, and life.

2. OUTLINE OF PROBLEM

Water is more than a natural resource; it is a necessity of life. Here in the United States, blessed with a continent of virgin soil, we lived more than 200 years before the water problem became generally acute. But the uses we make of water in modern society are so tremendous that they stagger the imagination. The coming of our industrial era, the raising of our living standards, and the increased application of water to land have now highlighted the problems until in much of the Nation there is a grave and increasing concern over water resources.

Shortages of water for domestic and agricultural use are frequent. Industry is finding it increasingly difficult to locate adequate water supplies. Many streams and rivers are seriously polluted. Concurrently, tremendous losses in water are being experienced through wasteful practices and failure to conserve available supplies. Lack of adequate planning threatens to impose a water scarcity which can become a limiting factor on the growth of some of our cities, while at the same time flood damage in many areas continues to be great.

* * * * *

Because these problems are nationwide, it is appropriate that the Federal Government take cognizance of them and provide leadership for solving them by establishing sound nationwide policies, as well as provide standards for its own participation in the development of economically sound water projects. It is also appropriate that this be done in cooperation with the States and other locally interested parties.

HOOVER COMMISSION—TASK FORCE REPORT ON WATER RESOURCES AND POWER

The economic development and conservation of water resources is vital to the future of the United States. Soundly conceived, efficiently executed, timed for our needs, it can strengthen the economy. Good development can supply new communities and growing cities with water, provide for expanding industries, open paths for transportation, water arid acres, generate power and establish means for recreation. Its management can conserve floodwaters for doing useful work and can contain, or at least reduce, floods that otherwise would endanger human lives and waste the substance of farm, factory, and city.

QUOTES FROM PRESIDENT EISENHOWER

Letter (May 26, 1954) to Secretary of the Interior Douglas McKay, designating him chairman of the Cabinet Committee on Water Resources Policy:

"The conservation and use which we make of the water resources of our Nation may in large measure determine our future progress and the standards of living of our citizens. If we are to continue to advance agriculturally and industrially we must make the best use of every drop of water which falls on our soil, or which can be extracted from the oceans."

State of the Union message, January 5, 1956:

"I wish to reemphasize the critical importance of the wise use and conservation of our great natural resources of land, forests, minerals and water, and their long-range development consistent with our agricultural policy. Water in particular now plays an increasing role in industrial processes, in the irrigation of land, in electric power, as well as in domestic uses. At the same time, it has the potential of damage and disaster.

"A comprehensive program for water conservation will be submitted to the Congress during the session. The development of our water resources cannot be accomplished overnight. The need is such that we must make faster progress and without delay."

If we do not solve the problem in an orderly fashion, we will eventually have to have a crash program, like the highway problem now confronting us, which will end up with extravagance and deficit spending, at the expense of the taxpayers of the Nation.

I voted to override the veto with great reluctance because I had to on the only criteria I know which I can follow—on the basis of right and wrong based on the facts.

Let us examine the veto message and compare it with the facts. You will then understand why it was based upon misinformation. The veto message charges a "tremendous expansion in Government expenditures in just this one area," and infers that there has been a threefold increase in expenditures, which leads us to deficit spending and our fiscal problems of today. What are the facts in respect to this? I am inserting at this point a series of tables:

Appropriations for Bureau of Reclamation

[In millions]

Appropriation made in calendar year	For fiscal year	Construction only	Total
1949	1950	$335.6	$358.9
1950	1951	243.7	271.7
1951	1952	207.8	234.4
1952	1953	177.7	206.4
1953	1954	116.3	143.0
1954	1955	133.8	161.4
1955	1956	146.0	180.1
1956	1957	157.0	193.8
1957	1958	161.8	204.5
1958	1959	214.3	265.8
1959	1960	212.1	256.7

Appropriations for Corps of Engineers

[In millions]

Appropriation made in calendar year	For fiscal year	Construction only	Total
1949	1950	$528.0	$640.6
1950	1951	595.0	619.5
1951	1952	480.0	617.2
1952	1953	464.4	562.0
1953	1954	320.5	426.6
1954	1955	352.4	443.7
1955	1956	492.2	611.9
1956	1957	516.5	639.2
1957	1958	509.8	638.6
1958	1959	671.2	816.0

Mr. Speaker, what do these tables show? In the first place, with regard to appropriations made by the Congress and signed by the President for each of the last 10 years:

As to reclamation, which is of primary interest to western water development, the appropriations for construction only, have dropped from $335.6 million, made in 1949 for fiscal year 1950, to $212.1 million in the bill vetoed in 1959 for fiscal year 1960—a drop of over $120 million.

For total reclamation, there was appropriated in 1949 for fiscal year 1950, $358.9 million, as compared to an appropriation in 1959 for fiscal year 1960, as vetoed, of $256.7 million, or a total drop of over $100 million. Obviously, Mr. President, this is no tremendous expansion. And those that advised you otherwise were simply in error.

In this respect, I would call the attention of my Democrat friends on the other side of the aisle to the fact that this is no party issue. These appropriations had in fact dropped to $177.7 million in 1952, the last year of the Truman administration, for construction, and to $206.4 million for total reclamation. Under this administration, they have in fact been brought up from that low level to $212.1 million for construction, and $256.7 million for total reclamation. Both of our political parties should work together to continue to meet the problem.

With regard to the Corps of Engineers, which is primarily concerned with flood control, the tables show that there was appropriated in 1949 for fiscal year 1950, $528 million, as compared to an appropriation in 1959 for fiscal year 1960, which was vetoed, of $749.1 million, or an increase of approximately $200 million. Total appropriations in 1949 for fiscal year 1950 were $640.6 million, as compared to $877.6 million in the bill vetoed, or a total increase of $237 million. Considering increased costs of construction and the problem, this can certainly not be justified as extravagant.

When these figures, however, were presented by myself to the executive, they said, "Oh, but those are appropriation figures, and it's expenditures that really count, because that's what means deficit spending or not."

All right, let us take a look at that on an expenditure basis. At this point I am inserting a chart which shows the facts, taken from the figures furnished by the executive:

Expenditure projection—Water resource construction agencies (actual 1950–59; projected 1960–63), assuming no new starts after 1959

[In millions of dollars]

You will note from this chart that expenditures for reclamation construction for the fiscal year 1950 were $298 million, whereas the expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, projected by the executive department itself, would only be $270 million, or $28 million less. The $14 million provided in the bill vetoed would still leave this at $14 million under 1950 expenditures.

With regard to the Corps of Engineers—flood control—you will note that expenditures for construction would go up from $627 million in fiscal year 1950 to $815 million for the fiscal year 1960, or an increase of $188 million.

The total expenditures for water development construction go up from $932 million in 1950 to $1,124 million in 1960, or an increase of only $192 million. Compare this with the total increase in Government expenditures of $39,617 million for 1950 to $77,030 million estimated for 1960, and you will realize that the $47 billion increase is not caused by this bill.

I think everyone knows where the increases have been, and I have taken the Health, Education, and Welfare Department's annual appropriation to point this out.

This shows that the total appropriation for this Department's activities in the year 1951 were $1,763 million, as compared to $3,449 million for fiscal year 1960, or almost a 100-percent increase of nearly $1,700 million. This and other similar areas are the real places that spending has increased, and a bill was just signed which went $259 million over the budget requests for this year alone. That is the bill which should have been vetoed. That is the bill which, as the chart proves, has the real, built-in increases.

I am sure that my colleagues will be interested in the expenditures for water development abroad.

In this year's foreign aid bill there is money for new starts on water development projects scattered all over the world totaling $320 million.

Apparently we can afford to develop the world, but we cannot afford to develop our own country to provide for our own children.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I yield.

Mr. HORAN. First, I want to commend my colleague for taking this time and spreading this on the RECORD. I am familiar with quite a number of the fiscal items the gentleman is mentioning here. I think the gentleman is taking a conservative approach in painting the picture as it is. No one really knows what all we are spending in foreign countries. No one knows how many American dollars we are spending in foreign countries for the development of reclamation, irrigation, water development including flood control and hydroelectric power projects. However, in the hearings on the foreign-aid bill on page 1465, we do have a table entered there by the foreign-aid administration which lists the 10 years from April 3, 1948, until December 31, 1958, not including the 1959 and 1960 budget which the gentleman has just mentioned. The total of American dollars, and these are direct appropriations for that period, was $516 million. I think this should be a part of the RECORD because there is a resentment at home because of this apparent discrimination against our own nationals.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I thank the gentleman for his contribution, and I congratulate the gentleman from Washington for I have had the privilege of associating with him on this committee, and he is one who is really informed on the importance of water development and also the importance of fiscal responsibility and having a proper and orderly development of water resources.

Mr. HORAN. If the gentleman will yield further, I think it is in the preparation for the creation of new wealth that we will find at least a portion of our future salvation. In this day and age when through cloverleaf intersections and highways and rights-of-ways and by urban development, we are taking present reclamation projects out of production, it is certainly not well understood, and it is not liked by those who see these things happening every year for us to be cutting down on the normal and sound progress in reclamation wherever it might be.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I agree with the gentleman and I thank him.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I yield to the gentlewoman.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I do not know whether the gentleman saw the television picture of the President and Mr. Macmillan in England in which they both agreed that you must spend a great deal in developing underdeveloped countries abroad.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I cannot agree at all that we can do that at the American taxpayers' expense if we cannot develop our own country for our needs and those of our children.

Now, the people who undertook to advise the President know just as well as I do that the increases in spending have not been in the area of water development, and they know full well where they have been occurring. Why do they not have the political courage to recommend the proper action?

However, just in case their memories may need refreshing, and for the information of the Members of the House, I am inserting at this point tables taken from the "Budget in Brief for Fiscal Year 1960," prepared by the Bureau of the Budget, the Executive Office of the President, showing budget expenditures by function and budget totals and public debt for the years 1953 to 1960. Anyone who studies these tables can see where the real areas of extravagant spending are, and it is not in the military, which has gone down from $50 billion to $46 billion, and again I repeat that it is not in the water resource development.

The veto message further states that the bill would have included 67 unbudgeted projects, with an eventual cost of over $800 million. This is misleading information. Included in this figure is the Burns Creek project in Idaho which is unauthorized, and therefore could not possibly be constructed, and the Trinity power project, which the President still wants left in, both of which I shall discuss later and which total over $100 million; and the small loan project money of $17.8 million. When these are eliminated, the total cost of projects for future construction in reclamation is $85 million, instead of over $206 million.

Similar adjustments must be made for the Corps of Engineers, where Kahului Harbor project is unauthorized and therefore cannot possibly be built.

Offset against this must be the three projects which were recommended in the budget and on which construction was stopped. When these adjustments are made, we end up with less than 50 projects, with a total cost of about $500 million. This would be spread out over a construction period of 10 years. Offset against it would have to be the projects which would be completed, of which there are 40 in the coming fiscal year, with about the same total estimated cost. Therefore, the bill would not be expanding the construction program in years ahead.

I could go on at some length, continuing to show by the facts that the veto was ill considered because it was based upon false information, but I do not think that is necessary. The point is already made. What is really important is that we are now apparently deadlocked in an impossible situation.

The Appropriations Committee has today voted out the bill as vetoed, with a 2.5-percent cut in all appropriation items, which would result in the bill being below the budget estimates. Although I voted for this, I frankly doubt if it will solve the problem. Although I will vote for it again if it is brought up on the floor of the House, I would seriously doubt if it could become law.

What must be done is to take a reasonable approach to this problem and come up with some solution.

The full Appropriations Committee met yesterday at 10 o'clock. At 11:45, we adjourned after adopting a preferential motion referring the bill back to the subcommittee. This was the bill introduced by the chairman of the committee, which would have carried out his interpretation of the President's veto message, as shown on page 17455 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 31, 1959, which I am inserting at this point, and which would strike out the construction money for all unbudgeted projects except the Trinity, and would leave in the unbudgeted advance planning and general investigation money for 121 projects.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS OF HON. CLARENCE CANNON, OF MISSOURI, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MONDAY, AUGUST 31, 1959

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, an analysis of the veto message on the public works appropriation bill for 1960—H.R. 7509—shows clearly that the basis of the President's objection to the bill is the unbudgeted construction starts. No reference is made to unbudgeted general investigations and preconstruction planning items. Items in these categories do not represent substantial dollar commitments and the absence of any reference to them in the veto message warrants the conclusion that the President has no objection to them. Unbudgeted items added by the Congress in thse two categories are:

Rivers and harbors and flood control:
General investigations	89
Advance planning	32
Subtotal	121
Bureau of Reclamation:
General investigations	1
Advance planning	0

The veto message makes no reference to increases or decreases made by the Congress on budgeted items. It can therefore be assumed that there is no objection on the President's part to the individual project figures in H.R. 7509 for all projects which were budgeted.

The only reference which the veto message makes to power facilities concerns the Trinity River project in California. The statement concedes that funds for starting Federal construction of these facilities are necessary unless partnership development with Pacific Gas & Electric Co. is authorized. In the absence of any other reference to power facilities, it may be assumed that there is no objection to other adjustments made by the Congress in the power program.

The following two lists indicate which unbudgeted items would remain in the bill and which would be eliminated if the veto is sustained:

[1] Reimbursements to local interests.

[2] Resumption of construction.

Mr. Speaker, the full committee met again this morning, and after an hour voted to report the bill as vetoed, with the 2.5 percent across-the-board cuts.

Never did we really get down to trying to figure out a solution. It seems to me that we must do this, both as the legislative and the executive, if we are to meet our mutual responsibilities to the Nation in a manner which the people of America have a right to expect.

For this reason, I make the following suggestions, which may bring the problem into focus.

The President has repeatedly stated on other matters that he is willing to make reasonable compromise, and I think we should do likewise, but I think that as the facts above show, the Congress is basically right, and that we should not sacrifice principle or abdicate our responsibilities.

One of the things that annoyed me most and I am sure had a like effect upon many other Members who were placed in the same position, was that in deciding we would do what was right on this bill, based upon the facts, that is to vote to override the veto, we were confronted with the efforts of those who tried to tag us as "spenders" in their all-out effort to sustain the veto at all costs.

I have long realized the fiscal dangers to this Nation of irresponsible spending, and I have consistently voted for true economy since coming to Congress in 1955. All of you know that. Again, the President was not properly advised.

If we want to truly cut the cost of future programs, the place is not to cut in the construction money that was in the bill, but in the area of investigations and advance planning. The veto message was interpreted, apparently with the approval of the White House, to leave these unbudgeted funds in the bill.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I agree.

Mr. HORAN. We make the mistake, I think, of regarding investments in western development as grants. They are nothing of the kind; they are investments.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. And they are repaid.

Mr. HORAN. They are repaid to the Treasury twice: The actual cost with certain limitations, of course; but they are repaid in full. And in addition to that, the people are enabled to create new wealth and the tax coffers benefit from western development. That should be understood thoroughly. I repeat it now.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I agree with the gentleman. Everyone familiar with the program knows that investigations and advance planning are where the money or expenditures required can really be controlled.

Everyone familiar with the program knows this. Almost all members of the Appropriations Subcommittee have agreed in our committee meetings that that is the fact. These include 32 unbudgeted projects for advance planning, at a cost of $2,389,000, but which would require over $450 million in eventual expenditures to complete in future years.

These include 89 unbudgeted projects for general investigation, for which $1,541,900 was provided in the bill, which would cost from $1 billion to $2 billion in future years to complete.

If we really want to cut the water resource development program, which I do not think we should do, this is the place where we should cut, rather than on construction items. Actually, the first year of construction money is almost entirely for advance planning. I have had this checked, and in the area of reclamation for the projects which are authorized, but were unbudgeted and vetoed, the construction money in the bill was $4,779,000. Of this, $1,915,000 would be spent for what is the same as advance planning that was approved, or in other words, to initiate preconstruction activities to include collection of design data, designs and specifications, foundation explorations and associated activities. At least we must treat these projects the same as we treat those which are left in the bill.

I decided that although I did not think it was the best course of action, that if that was to be the basis of our vote, then we should have a real economy vote, and I offered in committee an amendment which would have eliminated the unbudgeted advance planning and general investigation money.

As I say, I do not think this is the best solution, but if the projects objected to are to be left out of the bill, then I think this must be done in the interest of true economy. There is absolutely no sense in accelerating advance planning on projects, if we can't afford to go ahead on those projects which we have on hand and are ready for construction money. That would be throwing the taxpayers' money down the drain. Therefore, if the projects for which construction money was provided remain out of the bill, then I think that these unbudgeted advance planning and general investigation funds must come out, and I will offer amendments to do such, just as I did in the committee. Whether or not those amendments are supported will be the true test as far as economy and cutting down spending are concerned. As I have shown, though, this is not the area of excess spending.

Another possible solution that would permit treating the projects ready for construction money at least as favorably as the unbudgeted projects which were left in the bill, would be to provide an increase in advance planning funds in both the Corps of Engineers appropriation and the reclamation appropriation, to complete the advance planning on these projects. To accomplish this, I would insert at page 8, line 12 of the bill ordered reported by the Appropriations Committee, the following amendment:

Strike $4,788,710 and insert in lieu thereof $6,703,710, of which $1,915,000 shall be used for advance planning to include collection of design data, designs and specifications, foundation explorations and associated activities, on the Greater Wenatchee, Cedar Bluff, East Bench, Frenchman-Cambridge (Red Willow), Hammond, Smith Fork and Seedskadee projects.

The effect of this, as compared with the construction funds provided in the vetoed bill, is shown in the table which I shall insert at this point:

TABLE 6.—Portion of figures for new starts in fiscal year 1960 budget allocated to preconstruction work

Project	Fiscal year 1960 requirements, total	Preconstruction requirements
Greater Wenatchee	$500,000	$275,000
Missouri River Basin:
Cedar Bluff	400,000	165,000
East Bench	1,000,000	400,000
Frenchman-Cambridge (Red Willow)	[1] 525,000	[1] 100,000
Colorado River storage project:
Hammond	500,000	145,000
Seedskadee	1,354,000	630,000
Smith Fork	500,000	200,000
Total	4,779,000	1,915,000

[1] Red Willow: This is in addition to $150,000 in the budget program for preconstruction.

A similar amendment would have to be offered for the Corps of Engineers funds. The Corps advises me that they would require $572,000 for these activities to bring the vetoed projects for which this work has not been done up to the point that they are ready to award construction contracts. Although this would be a better solution, I still do not think it is the best one.

Finally, we come to what I think is the best solution and the one which should be adopted. I think that we should pass the bill as vetoed, with these amendments:

We should adopt the committee amendment to make an across-the-board cut of 2½ percent. This would make the appropriation below budget estimates for this year. In addition, in the area of reclamation, we should take out the Burns Creek project and the Trinity power facilities. This would result in a further reduction of current appropriations of $2,915,000, and the elimination of projects with an eventual cost of $104,233,000. Eliminating the small-loan projects which are only appropriated for 1 year, it would only leave in the bill $4,779,000 for construction of projects with a total cost of $85 million, which would be spread out over a period of 10 years and would have little impact upon future budgets.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HORAN. The gentleman mentioned the Burns Creek and Trinity projects and said he felt they should be taken out of the bill. What was the gentleman's reason?

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I will cover that.

The Burns Creek project should be eliminated because it is unauthorized and is, in my opinion, a bad project which should never be authorized. The total cost of it is really $49 million. It is strictly a power project, which would produce power at a cost of over 5.4 mills per kilowatt-hour, to be sold at 3.67 mills per kilowatt-hour, and would take millions of dollars from the true reclamation program. Regardless of whether it is a good project or not, however, it is not authorized. The House Interior Committee has passed it over for continuation of hearings next year, and there is no chance of it being authorized so as to commence construction in this fiscal year. It should come out of the bill and to take it out could not possibly do any harm.

The President was misinformed again as far as the importance of providing funds for the Trinity power facilities this year. The private utility company has stated in writing to the Secretary of the Interior and that it will continue with the preparation of final design and specifications, of required major equipment and engineering studies in collaboration with the Bureau of Reclamation engineers, and will make all of these available without charge to the Bureau. This is what the funds provided in this bill are designed to do. Mr. Dominy, the Commissioner of Reclamation, in response to a question asked by the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, stated, "We could take over their designs without a measurable delay in completing this project." Here is a chance to really save the taxpayers some money. Besides that, what has happened on this bill clearly points up the need for construction of the Trinity power facilities as a partnership project.

Unless we want our reclamation program brought to a halt, we cannot permit power to be used to subsidize power instead of being used for reclamation assistance. To refresh your memory, the Trinity project was authorized in the 84th Congress, with the proviso that it would be studied as to partnership possibilities, and with a rather clear understanding, as shown by the record and the law, that if this was the most beneficial way to proceed, then it would be done.

Unfortunately, even though this has been proved, the partnership has been blocked.

The President is in error about the necessity for constructing these power facilities, because the effect of this would be to produce power at a cost of 8.9 mills to 9.6 mills per kilowatt-hour, which would be sold to SMUD—Sacramento Municipal Utility District—at a rate of 4.5 mills, or at a big loss. There is no point in hurrying to construct something that is going to operate at a loss.

Furthermore, over a period of 50 years this would result in a loss to the reclamation fund of $175 million. I would say to my friends who have felt they must support this project for other reasons that his veto brings quite sharply to our attention that, unless these funds are made available to reclamation, we are going to destroy the reclamation program. Furthermore, this project would result in the loss of Federal taxes over the 50-year period of $83 million, or a total loss to the taxpayers of the Nation of over $318 million.

So I say to you, Mr. President, there should be no hurry to get this project constructed, and I say to my fellow Members of Congress that we should avoid this expenditure entirely; but, at the very least, there would be no harm done in not including it in this bill, because the same information will be provided to us for free that the money appropriated would be used to acquire, at taxpayer expense, in all events.

I am not so familiar with the Corps of Engineers appropriation, but I do know that there is $140,000 provided for construction of the Kahului Harbor project in Hawaii, which would eventually cost $963,000, and should in all events come out because it is not authorized.

In addition to that, there were 12 projects out of 28 added in the Senate which were approved in conference. I think the Members of Congress who have a real knowledge of this should get together and figure out six or seven other projects, or perhaps more, which could be rightfully taken out without doing serious damage to the water resource development program, and would materially reduce the program so that we might reasonably expect the Executive to accept it. If all of these projects are of such merit that they should be included, then I would say knock out the one unauthorized project and still go forward.

But I do think that in any event, true leadership should be shown in this House, and we should get together to pass a bill that would provide for the adequate development of this Nation's water resources, which everyone agrees is necessary, including the President.

It is unfortunate that he was given misinformation, but we should not allow the Nation to suffer. Both the Congress and the Executive have the responsibility to see that this is done. If this leadership is not shown so that this can be done, either by further action of the committee or otherwise, then I think that we should proceed to do such on the floor of the House, and will offer the amendments to do so on the basis of these remarks unless someone comes up with a better solution. I will offer these in the inverse order here presented based on what I consider their merit to be.

I urge your support of my efforts as being true economy and true responsibility.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, on rollcall No. 165 I was unavoidably detained. If I had been present, I would have voted "yea." I was called away on very important business.

"THOUGH THE MILLS OF GOD GRIND SLOWLY, YET THEY GRIND EXCEEDINGLY SMALL"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, an editorial in today's Chicago Tribune, captioned "They're Catching Up With Glimco at Last," calls to mind the above quotation. That editorial reads:

THEY'RE CATCHING UP WITH GLIMCO AT LAST

Joey Glimco's name was not a familiar one 5 years ago when the Tribune began to publish what may be called gleanings from the biography of a thoroughly disreputable character. In fact, his name was scarcely known outside the hoodlum circles in which he moved. Since then the gleanings have become a bumper harvest. Glimco is no longer an obscure character.

In the intervening years, a few details were filled in by the Federal prosecutors, even though their attempt to send Glimco to the penitentiary, where he surely deserves to be, were unsuccessful. More information, some of it new and some of it corroboratory, came from the McClellan committee which had the advantage in conducting an investigation of the power of subpena, which our reporters lacked.

It all began when Sandy Smith, a Tribune reporter, when driving past Tony Accardo's house spotted a fancy car parked in front and noted its license number. Passing the house on several other days, he saw the same car. He took the trouble to find out who owned the car. It was registered in the name of Glimco, a name as unfamiliar then to Smith as it was to almost everybody else. He began to make inquiries. That was the start.

The effort is beginning to pay off. The Glimco who shook down the chicken wholesalers, squandered the dues of the members of his union on houses and vacations for himself and his mistress, and even used union money to defend himself against the charge he had misappropriated union money, has been ordered to resign from the presidency of Teamsters' Local 777. The order comes from the monitors appointed by the U.S. district court to cleanse the Hoffa union of many forms of corruption.

This is good but it is not enough. Glimco has yet to be tried for his violations of the criminal code of Illinois. On some of his crimes the statute of limitations has run, but his known misdeeds are many and some of them are recent enough to permit prosecution. So far, all that the forces of law in Illinois have done to him is to pick up his driver's license.

It is my hope that the editor of the Tribune is not unduly optimistic.

This incident and the editorial are called to your attention today because a lack of law enforcement by State officials—yes, and some lack on the part of Federal law enforcement agencies—made it necessary for the House today to enact additional labor legislation.

Many an outrageous, atrocious crime publicized by the McClellan committee has gone unpunished because the statute of limitations has run.

If the people will now turn their attention to, and direct their activities at, their local law-enforcing officials, insist upon a strict performance of duty, as has been the practice in days gone by in the Fourth Congressional District of Michigan, some of the outrageous situations in various cities and States may be ended, the necessity for further national legislation cease.

The incident shows that the determination of the Tribune reporter Sandy Smith finally will bring results. He is to be commended.

PRESERVING COMPETITION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the American people are deeply devoted to the preservation of the free competitive enterprise system. Most businessmen are willing to hold their own in the fair competitive tussle. Unhappily, the greatest enemy of the free competitive enterprise system in America is not the Communist Party; it is not government, not the labor unions; it is in the ranks of business itself. I refer to those businessmen who seek to build monopoly or destroy competition by tactics which are immoral, if not illegal, unfair and unethical.

These remarks are prompted by a situation currently occurring in the Denver metropolitan area, the suburban portion of which I represent. A few months ago several food chains and several national dairy chains touched off a milk price war whose effect was to cause the independent dairies to lose money so rapidly that a few more months of the price war would have driven some of them out of business. In the course of the price war, some of those who were hurt were more vocal than others. The spokesman for the independents, in requesting a congressional investigation—and an investigation of possible violations of Federal law by the FTC and Department of Justice—was a fine young man representing an independent dairy operating in my district. At the hearings we recently concluded he was a witness and he was helpful to the committee in securing other witnesses who testified under oath with respect to the pricing practices prevailing in the Denver market. On August 4, 1959, he wrote me as follows:

OWEN'S DAIRY,
Englewood, Colo., August 4, 1959.

Hon. BYRON JOHNSON,
U.S. House Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN JOHNSON: I find it hard to convince myself that in this wonderful country of ours one man, one company, or any minority group can, at their slightest whim, push fellow Americans out of business. Our company, as an example, is approximately 30 years old. It was started by George Owen. After several years he decided that the business was taking too many hours away from his farming. My father, Lynn Miller, purchased one-half interest in the business in 1947. Since that time he has acquired the entire business. Our family has worked day and night these past 12 years to make this business what it is today. We have a new plant, built in 1952, as well as tripling our business and replacing and adding new trucks and equipment. All our money is tied up in this business. We have a good many assets; however, they are not worth anything in times such as these. We are now faced with the prospect of being wiped out entirely, or if we happen to survive, being dictated to for the rest of our days in the dairy business.

Is this the future that faces all of America's small business? This is not the America that was envisioned by our forefathers, the men that formed the framework of our Nation. This is the road to monopoly, socialism, and finally communism. I know how you feel on this subject; how do the other Congressmen feel? Do they realize how serious this problem is? Is there anything more that I personally can do?

I know that the FTC and also the Justice Department are overworked and undermanned; nevertheless, here is an opportunity for the Government to show the monopolies that they are not going to idly stand by while at least 15 independent, reputable businessmen are wiped out. Now is the time to stop this cancer called monopoly. Not next year, or next month, but now.

I probably sound a lot like the fellow on the soapbox in the park, but maybe we need to get that type of thing back; perhaps it would awaken the people to the threat of monopoly. When monopoly controls all business they will also control all people, consumers included.

Naturally we want to continue in our business if at all possible. Whether or not our company is still in business, I will be more than willing to do anything possible to assist in the job of controlling monopoly, one of the greatest threats to our country.

Sincerely,

PAUL R. MILLER.

Mr. Speaker, he acted openly and honorably in the finest American tradition and I want to pay tribute to Paul R. Miller of Owen's Dairy for his courage. According to the information available to me, the Owen's Dairy does not have more than 2 percent of the home delivery market. It is not a major factor to Denver, but it is operated in the finest tradition of American free competitive enterprise.

Recently one of the old independent dairies, City Park, was merged with Brookridge, and City Park-Brookridge is owned and operated now not as an independent but as part of a national chain under Beatrice Foods. This national chain dairy had played a leading part in the price war and is now playing a leading part in disciplining Owen's Dairy. The word "discipline" I understand is the polite word used to define cutting the throats of those who dare to defend their rights.

I have been advised by friends of Owen's Dairy that a systematic campaign is being conducted to bribe, browbeat, or induce Owen's customers to transfer their patronage to City Park-Brookridge. Fancy premiums are offered to the customers in an effort to induce them to quit the dairy which has given them service over so long a period. Naturally, if this campaign is successful, it will destroy not just another independent dairy, it will destroy the leading spokesman for all the independent dairies in the area. The company is defending itself with a letter to its customers, as follows:

DEAR CUSTOMER: We want to take this opportunity to thank you for your patronage and loyalty, especially through the last two price wars. It is our sincere hope that you will remain one of our valued customers in spite of the concentrated efforts that one of our competitors is making to attract our customers away from us.

It is quite natual for the consumer to welcome a price war of any kind, gasoline, milk or otherwise, for the simple reason that price reductions will relieve the consumer's budget temporarily. We call your attention to the word "temporarily" because no business can continue to operate long on a basis of selling below cost. The purpose of a price war, that is, temporarily selling below cost, is to put one or more competitors out of business so that the market can be monopolized; once this happens the competitive prices now prevailing would be a thing of the past.

We welcome fair and honest competition. That is the backbone of our democratic economy. However, the actions of one nationally owned milk company do not meet this test. Our customers are being solicited by this large company—not for the immediate purpose of enlarging the success of that company—but for the purpose of crippling our business. The methods employed consist of severe price cutting, offers of free merchandise or milk products, and including false and slanderous statements about our company. The offers made to some of our customers indicate that it is the intention of this competitor to attract all of our customers away from us, regardless of the cost involved. Once successful, this large competitor could concentrate on another independent milk company such as ours, and then another, until the market was monopolized and prices could be raised without competition.

Owen's Dairy is now the initial target for this insidious scheme because it has resisted the nationally owned companies in their efforts at monopoly.

We believe we have built our business upon the basis of quality products and excellent service. We intend to continue upon exactly the same basis and assure you that you will receive the best products for the lowest consistent prices.

If you are invited to accept delivery from another company, we would welcome your call and appreciate an opportunity to discuss the matter with you. It is important to both of us.

Sincerely,

OWEN'S DAIRY.

If an American chain operation will use unfair and underhanded tactics deliberately to destroy one company for having had the temerity—the audacious courage—to avail itself of the remedies which Congress has provided, it will have effectively repealed the laws of Congress, because other businessmen will realize that if they avail themselves of the remedies which we provide, they will be destroyed.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that this kind of behavior in which a large and prosperous corporation deliberately destroys a small and lean corporation is the kind of behavior which is the worst enemy of the free competitive enterprise system. I do not believe that all is fair in love, war, politics, or business. I think men and institutions both have an obligation to the community. I think the community must judge them by the moral and ethical content of their behavior and not just by their profit and loss statements. It may well be that the Congress cannot pass laws adequate to protect the public against the destructive practices of those predatory businessmen who seek to destroy competition so as to fatten themselves at the public expense. We can do no less than try, but we can also call the whole issue to the attention of the American people, to the attention of the industry involved and to the attention of the consumers of that industry, that they may be alerted. And let me warn again, let the buyer beware.

If the buyers give their patronage exclusively to the major corporations who will offer them temporary advantages, they run risks. So long as competition prevails, they are protected against monopoly price increases, but after competition has been destroyed, monopolies will set those prices which will yield highest profits. It is much easier to take a firm out of this business than it is to get a new one in this business. Consequently monopoly profits, after competition is destroyed, are not in fact a guarantee that competition can be restored. It is awfully hard to unscramble the monopoly corporate eggs.

I want to commend not only those brave souls in the Denver area who continue to support free competitive enterprise, I also want to pay tribute to those Members of Congress and congressional staffs who seek to preserve competition. I refer especially to the members of the Select Committee on Small Business and their staff who have been standing like Horatius on the bridge safeguarding competition against the enemy within. I refer, of course, to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. STEED], and their five associates.

Let me warn those who think that the free enterprise system can continue to operate as it has if it is no longer the free competitive enterprise system. If free enterprise now means monopoly, and if competition is to be sacrificed on the altar of corporate monopoly, the day will come when the American people will have to choose among three alternative routes. One route is to give the Government over to its corporate masters, and this is the route of fascism which some nations have chosen in our generation. A second route is expanded public regulation over business in which the Government tries to tell business what it may or may not do in an effort to protect the public against the abuses of its corporate masters. The final alternative will be the more revolutionary choice of direct socialization of enterprise in which the public will take over those businesses whose behavior no longer serves the public interest. Many nations in Western Europe have been driven to some form of socialization, because they have not had a strong tradition of free competitive enterprise. In those countries cartels and monopolies have been considered good ideas and sound business practices in the past. Fortunately, they, too, have been reconsidering the virtues of competition and favoring it.

The issues with which we deal involve more than the right of one dairy to stay in business. The bigger issue is more than the morality of one business firm which seeks to destroy a competitor for using his right of free speech and right to petition for redress of grievances. The bigger issue is not only the nature of our economy but the nature of our whole society itself. Those who choose to ignore the broader issue while pursuing any route to profit, however unethical, must accept the burden of blame which history will come to lay at their door for the consequences of their action.

Meanwhile, I invite the Members of the House to support with renewed zeal the preservation of competitive free enterprise while there is yet time.

Mr. STUBBLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. STUBBLEFIELD. Referring to getting the highest price, that is synonymous to all the traffic will bear, is it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. It is all that the traffic will bear.

Mr. STUBBLEFIELD. I want to wholeheartedly join the gentleman from Colorado in his presentation here. I am experiencing the same trouble in my district, where they are selling three half gallons of milk for $1, and the milk costs 36 cents to produce. I want to thank the gentleman for his assistance in guiding me in trying to correct that situation down there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I certainly hope it can be corrected, not only in your district and in my district, but throughout the country. I think the competitive-enterprise system must be preserved.

Mr. STUBBLEFIELD. Would the gentleman care to comment on the effect that this cutthroat competition would have on our milk producers, the small milk producers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The situation that was obtaining during the recent price war in the Denver area was so serious that one dairy told me they were losing more than $100 a day. This is a small dairy. Another small dairy was losing over $70 a day. Now, you do not have to be much of a mathematician to figure out how long the net worth of a corporation would last if it is a small corporation under those circumstances. More than that, if you assume the businessman has any reason or sense at all, he is going to want to bail out before he is broke and his creditors have him in the bankruptcy court. So he may be tempted to sell out to the very monopolist who brought on the condition in an effort to save what little stake he has in the hope maybe he can find someplace else to invest his money and get back into the enterprise system.

The tragedy is that the cutthroat competition is so unfair. The national chain can take the profits it makes in other parts of the country and subsidize a local outlet at great length for long periods of time without worrying about any danger to their profit situation, but the little independent businessman in this one community does not have a national chain to help him and when he is forced to sell below cost it eats into his capital quickly and drives him to the wall.

Mr. STUBBLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I am happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STUBBLEFIELD. Would the gentleman care to comment about the price spread between the producer and the consumer?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I am distressed over that. These national, vertical, integrated chains have things pretty much in their own hands. It has happened in my area of the country that the processor will own a dairy herd or several dairy herds, or a dairy milking operation, and he will lease the herd, or 3, or 5, or 10, and he will be independent for a portion of his supply. He will have a sufficient source of supply for most of his needs so that he can then ply the whip hand to the producers and say: "Either cut your price to what I will pay or I will expand my operation further and I will buy nothing from you."

This kind of situation already obtains in a portion of the livestock industry in my area and I am fearful it will prevail in the dairy industry. They want to control the supply so they can set the price to the producer even as they gouge the consumer with higher prices.

Mr. STUBBLEFIELD. The result is that when competition is eliminated a monopoly would set the price of the producer's milk.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. If you are the sole buyer or if a group of buyers get together and support the set price they can set the price they will pay just as they can set the price for what they sell, since the producers have no alternative.

Mr. STUBBLEFIELD. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I appreciate the gentleman's interest. I hope we can by this method call the attention of the American people to the risks in this vital industry, not just to the independent businessman but also to the consumer and to the producer. I want a fair price structure, but it has got to be fair for all, the producer, processor, retailer, and the consumer.

Mr. STUBBLEFIELD. I agree wholeheartedly with the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point an editorial from the Paducah Sun-Democrat of August 31, dealing with this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

(The editorial referred to follows:)

DANGEROUS MILK PRICING PRACTICES OBVIOUS HERE, SAYS INVESTIGATOR

(By Don Pepper)

Obvious unfair pricing exists in Paducah's milk market which, unless stopped, will destroy independent producers here, a House investigator said today.

"It's just prima facie," said Brooks Robertson, the investigator. "Of course, I'm just starting the investigation, but I drove around town yesterday and saw signs on grocery windows advertising milk for 25 cents.

"You can't produce milk for that."

Robertson, investigator for the Special Subcommittee on Dairy Problems of the House Select Committee on Small Business, is conducting a 1-day inquiry into pricing practices of milk producers and distributors in this area.

FOLLOWING PATTERN

Robertson said Paducah's milk market, on the face of it, appears to be following a pattern that is nationwide.

Investigations across the Nation have shown that eight or nine giant milk producers are gradually eliminating competitors at the local level, said Robertson.

Once competition is eliminated in a locality and a milk monopoly established, milk prices shoot up to astronomical levels, he said.

"This has already happened in New York and Chicago," he said.

"There is no competition in milk in either city, and milk prices are out of sight."

NOT HERE TO RAISE PRICES

Robertson said he wanted to make it clear that he isn't in Paducah to raise milk prices.

He is here as a factfinding investigator for the subcommittee. The subcommittee, in turn, is to recommend legislation to restore competitive conditions in the dairy industry.

Violations of existing antitrust and unfair competition laws which the investigation discloses will be turned over to the Federal Trade Commission or to the Department of Justice for action.

HEARING POSSIBLE HERE

A hearing before the subcommittee could be scheduled here if the investigation fails to achieve correction of undesirable practices, said Robertson.

The practices which the subcommittee has found across the Nation, said Robertson, includes below-cost prices set up in an area by monopoly milk producers. The monopoly makes up its losses there by raising prices in another area where it has already driven out competition.

Then when competitors are destroyed in the new area, prices again shoot up to compensate for below-cost prices in another area which the monopoly seeks to dominate.

As a result of its investigations, the subcommittee has tentatively recommended three new laws:

1. To require publication of prices, discounts, rebates, allowances, commissions, loans and gifts by all sellers.

2. To prohibit price discriminations which would have the effect of substantially lessening competition or tending to create a monopoly.

3. To provide for process under the Federal Trade Commission Act for temporary injunctive relief pending issuance of final orders in litigated cases.

A bill embodying the third recommendation has already been introduced in the House. Rep. FRANK A. STUBBLEFIELD of Murray was one of several legislators who introduced a bill for that purpose.

It was at STUBBLEFIELD's request, said Robertson, that the subcommittee dispatched him to Western Kentucky to investigate the milk situation.

INFERIOR MILK ISSUE

Robertson pointed out that under monopoly conditions inferior milk frequently is placed on the market.

The McCracken County Health Department said, however, that it stands ready to guarantee consumers that inferior milk will not be sold here.

Dr. Norman Parrott pointed out that dairy products sold on the Paducah market must, by ordinance, meet U.S. Public Health Service standards.

The health department, said Dr. Parrott, feels it can enforce those standards here.

Robertson said he will be at the Irvin Cobb Hotel today and tonight to hear those affected by the milk market.

"I want to hear people from all levels of the market, from producer to consumer," said Robertson.

He said he will work all night if necessary. First he intends to hear complaints, then representatives of the larger dairies and chainstores, milk producers and consumers.

Democratic members of the subcommittee, whose chairman is Democrat TOM STEED of Oklahoma, are Representative JAMES ROOSEVELT of California and Representative CHARLES BROWN of Missouri. Republican members are Representative HOWARD W. ROBISON of New York and Representative EDWARD J. DERWINSKI of Illinois.

The parent committee is under the chairmanship of Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, Texas Democrat.

"Mr. PATMAN," said Robertson, "has devoted 30 years to the work of protecting competition in American small business. He has made it the ruling principle of his life to preserve the free enterprise system."

WESTERN STATES CONFERENCE OF YOUNG DEMOCRATIC CLUBS

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. WILSON] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, word has reached many of us here in Congress of action by a supposedly responsible segment of the Democrat Party which is not only startling but does represent in fact, as one editorial writer put it, the voice of the naive.

The Western States Conference of the Young Democratic Clubs of America at a meeting in San Francisco this week adopted a resolution, with only one dissenting vote, calling for the United States to establish diplomatic relations with Red China.

I am reminded that just 2 weeks ago this House by an overwhelming vote of 368 yeas to 2 nays passed a concurrent resolution which stated:

That it is the sense of the Congress that its opposition to the seating at the United Nations of the Communist China regime as a representative of China should be and is hereby reiterated; and be it further

Resolved, That it is hereby declared to be the continuing sense of the Congress that the Communist regime in China has not demonstrated its willingness to fulfill the obligations contained in the Charter of the United Nations and should not be recognized to represent China in the United Nations.

This affirmative vote, Mr. Speaker, by all but two of our colleagues can leave no question as to the attitude of the people of the United States with respect to any recognition of this aggressor nation.

The timing of this resolution is further astounding when we consider that at the present time the Red Chinese are still holding captive American soldiers and American citizens, are assaulting the territory of free China at Quemoy and Matsu, have invaded the country of Tibet and are threatening to do the same thing in Laos, and at the present time are engaged in acts of violence on the borders of India.

Mr. Speaker, need I remind these young people that our President is at this very moment meeting with the leaders of the world in the interests of peace while the Red Chinese are committing overt acts of aggression against the free peoples of several countries.

I hope and pray, Mr. Speaker, that responsible leaders in the Democrat Party will enlighten these young people and will persuade them in their forthcoming national convention in Toledo, Ohio, to adopt responsible resolutions to disavow the resolution adopted by the Western States Conference of the Young Democratic Clubs of America.

OUR CHEMICAL, BIOLOGICAL, AND RADIOLOGICAL POLICIES ARE MORALLY INDEFENSIBLE

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HECHLER] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, this body yesterday had the opportunity of listening to a wise, factual, and thought-provoking speech by my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTENMEIER] on the increasing emphasis being placed on the Nation's development of chemical, biological, and radiological weapons.

My colleague, who has obviously devoted a great deal of research, study, and thought to this grave subject, expressed very precisely and thoughtfully the sobering moral issue which is parallel to and rising in importance with the accelerated development of these weapons.

I wish to concur fully with this able presentation, to congratulate my colleague on the excellence of his presentation, and to commend the reading of his remarks to every Member of this body.

I particularly want to applaud the gentleman from Wisconsin for the emphasis which he placed on the deplorable, but apparently growing tendency of our military leaders who are charged with the development of this program to disregard the essential inhumanity of these weapons and to attempt to sell them to the American people and to the world as clean or humane.

I also heartily concur with his deep concern over the abandonment by these same officials of the principle that the United States must use its strength and military might only for defensive and retaliatory purposes.

While these generals decry the notion that they might ever be accused of advocating preventive war, they speak piously against agreements "that if we are going to fight we are going to do it with our hands tied behind our backs," and urge that "we must change our policy, which is that we do not hit back until you hit us."

These pseudo sabre rattlers describe this recommended policy of striking first if it is evident that an enemy is about to strike us as preemptive war.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that it is self-evident that preemptive war is nothing more than preventive war. They are all policies that are totally alien and unacceptable to a democratic society filled with the fervent desire for real, lasting peace throughout the world.

The attitudes of many of our military leaders who now or in the past have been directly associated with the development of chemical and biological weapons is morally outrageous, and wholly indefensible in a world already groping for a solution to the awesome nuclear stalemate.

These individuals, of course, are entitled to their opinions. However, in the powerful, secrecy-cloaked offices they administer, they are given unique power to activate their philosophies in a manner that, I am sure, is detrimental to the welfare of the Nation and mankind.

Expressions of this frightening philosophy, and actions which have sprung from it, have come frequently to my attention in hearings held before the House Science and Astronautics Committee, on which I am privileged to serve.

Maj. Gen. William M. Creasy, former head of the Army's Chemical Warfare Corps, for example, scoffed at the very concept of disarmament negotiations in response to a question I put to him at one of these hearings. He went so far as to question the wisdom of disarmament discussions even in the field of nuclear weapons.

Yet just a few moments earlier he had conceded that he would use nuclear weapons to devastate four places in the Soviet Union if the Communists should start any more "brushfires" or regional agitation.

But at the same time, General Creasy was describing the biological and chemical agents which the Army is developing as "humane," and saying that they were designed to prevent war as deterrents.

Under unanimous consent, I submit the following excerpt from hearings before the House Committee on Science and Astronautics on June 16 and 22, 1959:

Mr. HECHLER: It is not the province of this committee nor do I want to get you into any discussion of high policy strategy here, but I was disturbed a little by what you inferred about outlawing these weapons, and I would just like to ask you, are you in favor of disarmament, providing it is gangsterproof, providing you have guarantees?

General CREASY: Yes, sir; I would like utopia, also.

Mr. HECHLER: The way you answer that question——

General CREASY: I just don't believe it is practicable. I think your basic premise is you are dealing with people of integrity, and since your contract is no better than your judgment of the integrity of the people who made the contract, clearly a contract of this type would be self-voiding.

Mr. HECHLER: So, in other words, you believe not even in the nuclear field our Government should carry on negotiations for disarmament?

(No response.)

Mr. HECHLER: I don't want to press this too far, except I would like to relate your answer to this whole area that we are discussing.

General CREASY: I don't believe I could qualify myself as an expert in that area, but I think it is a fruitless exercise.

Mr. HECHLER: I can't get it through my thick head how it prevents a war to start a war. Here I think we might get into a rather long discussion which we could draw out at length which would not be profitable to this committee. But I do think it is dangerous and borders on the irresponsible to suggest this.

General CREASY: Yes, I think I disavowed any intention of talking about preventive wars. But you prevent wars by occupying a position, a posture, if you will, as well as a position, that makes it undesirable for other people to start wars with you.

Your posture is the thing that keeps him from wanting to slug it out with you. But your relative position must also be maintained. If you permit him to push you further back into a corner, whether he does this geographically or financially, you have lost the war.

Someplace in this series of withdrawals, he has really struck this blow. He has started this war. I think we must further define what this point is.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that more information about our potential in the CBR field must be made known to the American public and to the peoples of the world. Likewise, the American people and other peoples must be informed of what the Soviet Union and her satellites are doing in this area. On the one hand we are advertising these awesome, terrible weapons as deterrents to war, and on the other simultaneously denying the world all but the sketchiest of details about them—and this usually disseminated in the lurid, sensationalized format of the Sunday supplement.

If we are truly developing these weapons to discourage the Communist bloc from ever daring to make war upon the free world, then where is the wisdom of keeping any information which might indeed deter an enemy in the darkest and most heavily guarded classified file?

And if an enemy knows nothing of the potential which we have developed or are developing, how can the generals possibly suggest that the primary nature of these weapons are defensive or deterrent?

I am not suggesting that we strip our work in this area nude to the point that the technical or academic details—which might be of value to an enemy—are even remotely visible. But even the Military Establishment, with its preoccupation for secrecy, surely could give out enough information to justify the repeated insistence that theirs is a retaliatory or deterrent operation.

Now if it seems illogical to say we are scaring the Communist hobgoblin away by not mentioning a word about the weapons which we possess for the alleged sole purpose of scaring him—and this does indeed seem highly illogical—at least it is no less senseless that the concurrent policy of keeping our own people in the dark about the weapons which might be used against them.

We can hardly conceal discussion of our own progress in the field without belittling and discrediting any progress by the Russians in the same line.

Thus our own people are denied the information that might some day save their lives. I assure you that the same is not true in the Soviet Union.

Another hearing of the Committee on Science and Astronautics brought out the startling information that possibly today even more than 30 million people in the U.S.S.R. have been trained and have become imbued with the need for this defense, CBR-wise, among the civilian population. That statement was delivered by Dr. Nathan Gordon, Chief of the Army Chemical Corps Intelligence Agency.

And the present director of the Chemical Corps, Maj. Gen. Marshall Stubbs, said that "the Soviet civilian population receives thorough training in defense against chemical and biological warfare."

How many Americans have been similarly trained to protect themselves against this exotic new means of visiting death or incapacitation against our people? Thirty million? Thirty thousand would be an overly ambitious estimate, I would imagine.

But while the leaders of this program see the necessity for such a program of civil defense, virtually nothing has been done to instrument such a program. I must admit here that from the hearings we have held, it seems evident that some efforts have gone into protecting the lives and maintaining the combat effectiveness of our soldiers, but this is little comfort to the civilian population, who certainly would become the major casualties in any widespread chemical or biological attack.

From a standpoint of sheer survivability, it seems incomprehensible that some of our leaders would suggest preemptive use of CBR weapons against a populace well trained to cope with them, knowing full well that the enemy would retaliate with similar weapons against an American people ill-trained and uninformed about the horrors of chemical and biological warfare.

I think there has been a feeling that we have not had the national leadership in the past few years in order to lead the people, pinpoint their thinking and really to stir their feelings about the absolute necessity for disarmament and peace. I think that this, very frankly, is the job of the President of the United States. And I think that he could help to wake up our people to the dangers of CBR warfare and alert them to the need for planning defenses against these horrible weapons.

Recently, I had an opportunity to appear in a taped interview with correspondent Tris Coffin, discussing the moral and strategic aspects of this terrible new form of warfare. Under unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, I insert the text of this interview in the RECORD following my remarks.

Author, Columnist, and Radio Correspondent TRIS COFFIN: How is your moral fiber tonight? Well, the Army has found a way to tear it down completely—quite simply and cheaply, too. It's all part of a delightful new program which is being presented to the taxpayers in little, sugar-coated drops, and it's known as CBR. This stands for chemical, biological, and radiological warfare.

It was arranged to have the chemical warfare boys spread their tray of goodies before the House Science and Astronautics Committee. The committee was told that CBR is capable of tearing down the moral fiber of men, altering human behavior, and killing people with no mess at all.

One witness, a major general, described a psychochemical drug in these words: "There's a material in the human system that acts as a transmitter of a nerve impulse from one nerve joint to another. The nerve gas stops the production of this material and you do not have any nerve transmission. If this happens to nerves around the heart, the heart constricts and stops."

One member of the committee was particularly startled at the prospect of the Army chemists' brave new world. He is Congressman KEN HECHLER, of West Virginia, a former Princeton professor and White House assistant. I asked him if he did not think that the testimony was not like Aldous Huxley's famous fantasy, "Brave New World." The Congressman replied, on tape recording:

Mr. HECHLER: Well, it certainly was; and just sitting as a member of the Science and Astronautics Committee hearing about these new and terrible forms of warfare can be quite a depressing experience. I think that the reaction of some of the members of the committee was a little bit different. Others seemed to feel that this would provide a powerful new weapon in America's arsenal, but my own reaction was different. Looking at it from the standpoint of humanity and civilization itself, what steps are we going to have to take in order to protect not only our own country but all of civilization against its destruction?

Now, to my mind, it's very different to think in terms of a clean bomb or dirty bomb or certain types of warfare that are more or less destructive than others and therefore more or less humane. Naturally, all types of warfare are inhumane. Yet, it seems to me that this is an extension and a new type of warfare that's going to mean taking a lot of educational work on the part of our civilian defense to alert our people as to what is involved.

In addition to that, it's a great challenge to our social scientists, international lawyers and others who will have to figure out means of getting this within the framework of our thinking on international disarmament.

Mr. COFFIN: What are some of the types of CBR that were displayed or discussed before the committee?

Mr. HECHLER: There were several types. There are the so-called nerve gases, which in a sense change a person's personality and cause him to lose the will to fight. Then there are the more destructive agents which, if they touch the skin, can cause death in a very, very short space of time; or, if they even get on the clothing, can cause death in a few minutes.

There are agents which can be sprayed very easily from the exhaust of motor cars or motor boats, without any visible sign as these death-dealing agents are dispersed among the populations of our cities or military installations.

Mr. COFFIN: I detected, I thought, just an example of the "soft sell" when General Creasy was testifying.

Mr. HECHLER: I wasn't exactly sure what you meant by that phrase, the soft sell, Tris. What do you mean?

Mr. COFFIN: Well, I mean he used the word "humane" so many times as if this were something that ought to be taken up and accepted by mankind.

Mr. HECHLER: This has been a tendency, I notice, among all chemical warfare officers. When I was in the infantry during the war, and we were going through basic training, the chemical warfare officer assembled us and tried to get every member of our outfit to admit that the use of gas was more humane than any other type of warfare.

Mr. COFFIN: Congressman, you also spoke about social scientists. Is there any way in which we can start from the beginning and, in effect, teach mankind that war is—as you suggest—inhumane and that we had perhaps start working from the bottom to learn how we can eliminate it.

Mr. HECHLER: I think this is highly important, Tris. You know we recognize the necessity of catching up with Russia in the training of our scientists, engineers and others who can aid in the defense of the country, by producing more death-dealing missiles and agents of war. It seems to me that equally important is the training of social scientists in the ideals and imagination that can enable us to control and live in a better world. This is a challenge to social science and it's a challenge to civilization to produce this kind of thinking that has the idealism and the willpower to move ahead and make this a safer, better and more peaceful world.

Mr. COFFIN: I think that one problem is that peace is never presented as very heroic to people. We put up statues of our generals and write our great epic poetry about wars.

Mr. HECHLER: That's true. You may recall William James' book entitled "The Moral Equivalent to War." During wartime people feel a great sense of patriotism and national unity. Peace is a hard thing to come by, and it's for this reason, I think, that we are going to have to stir up the spirit of the people to realize that peace on earth, good will toward men is one of the greatest ideals that we can strive toward.

Mr. COFFIN: As a Congressman, of course, you are very close to the people. Do you find that there is an underlying hope among people in your own district whom you talk to for peace, so we won't have to use all these weapons?

Mr. HECHLER: It's a rather vague hope, Tris. I'm afraid that people tend to be a little pessimistic about the future. They rather vaguely hope that something may come out of it, and there's a feeling that we haven't had the national leadership in the past few years in order to lead the people, pinpoint their thinking and really to stir their feelings of the absolute necessity for disarmament and peace. I think that this, very frankly, is the job of the President of the United States.

I believe he's made some fine general speeches about disarmament, but on this question we were talking about—chemical, biological, and radiological warfare—the President has not really informed the American people of what these issues are. And he has not informed them of the nature of the challenge in trying to produce a peaceful world.

Mr. COFFIN: I read a memorandum—I suppose it's supposed to be confidential—by Arthur Schlesinger in which he suggested that the people a few years ago were not ready to be led, but they are coming to the place where they are seeking leadership. Do you think that's true?

Mr. HECHLER: Yes, I think there's a great deal of that. Of course, after World War I, we had an opportunity to rest for a few years. And then during World War II, the people were stirred to quite a great pitch and then they were left emotionally tired after the war. During the late 1940's and the 1950's their noses were kept to the grindstone by the worst cold war in history followed by the worst and most frustrating limited war in history, in Korea.

As a result, there was a great tendency to want to let down at some point, and I'm afraid that this letdown, which I feel has occurred in our national leadership, has really hurt us over the past few years. Yet there is a certain ferment which I believe portends a new feeling on the part of the people that we can and must move forward. What we need now, of course, is national leadership and I believe that that can be supplied only by the White House itself.

Mr. COFFIN: Thank you, Congressman KEN HECHLER, for this thoughtful discussion. This is Tris Collins.

KHRUSHCHEV UNMASKED

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, behind the curious make-believe attitude of the White House toward Khrushchev as it goes out of its way to confer respectability upon him, is the wishful thinking that he will abandon his life of crime after a visit to the United States.

But this master of deceit may score his most dangerous triumph by prevailing upon the Government of the United States to deceive itself.

This onetime shepherd boy became the world's No. 1 Communist by engineering mass murder, doublecrossing his associates, betraying captive peoples, and confusing other countries by his mixture of crude threats and assurances of peaceful coexistence.

The American people do not know much about the real Khrushchev and his bloodstained record. It is time they did, so that they will not be misled by his public smile or his straight-faced lies.

The alert and reliable U.S. News & World Report has contributed much to the cause of freedom through the years, but it has surpassed all its previous accomplishments in the September 7 issue, now on the stands. Its leading article, "Khrushchev—the Real Story of the Man and His Deeds," does a timely service in unmasking the unwelcome guest.

Read it and then be on guard.

WALTER R. LEE

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last, it was my privilege to join with many of my colleagues in expressing our regret that Walter R. Lee, legislative assistant to the House Committee on the Judiciary, had decided to retire from Capitol Hill. Only last weekend, without any warning, he became ill at his work, and due to the emergency, it was necessary to have him admitted to the hospital for medical attention.

However, I am pleased to advise that he is convalescing at his home and is well on the road to a full and speedy recovery.

Walter has written me expressing his thanks and appreciation for the tribute accorded him on the floor of the House, and the following is his letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U.S.,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C., September 3, 1959.

Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. LANE: Words are so inadequate to express my deep appreciation and heartfelt thanks to you for the tribute paid me on the House floor on Tuesday. Through you, I want to express my thanks to the Members of the House who so kindly expressed themselves in my behalf. I do not feel that I am worthy of the many kind remarks.

I am sure that you and my many friends know that it is not an easy task for me to say farewell to Capitol Hill and as I said to the committee last week, I hope that I may be able to enjoy my retirement with as much pleasure as I have my work and association with the Members of the Congress.

Through this media, because it is impossible for me to thank each one personally now, I want to thank the many Members and staffs for the many letters, cards, and telegrams which I have received on my retirement and illness and the beautiful flowers sent me in the hospital and since I am home.

I am on the road to complete recovery. So says my fine doctor, and I myself feel that I am, for which I am most thankful.

With all good wishes.

Most gratefully,

WALTER R. LEE.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Crab and Oyster Imports

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSSELL V. MACK

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 4, 1959

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, canned crabmeat and canned oyster imports from Japan are increasing at an alarming rate and threaten the prosperity and employment in the Pacific coast shellfish industry.

In the first 6 months of 1959 canned crabmeat imports from Japan totaled 4,289,000 pounds compared to 2,739,000 in the same period of the preceding year. This is an increase of 56 percent.

Canned oyster imports from Japan for the first 6 months of 1959 were 2,600,000 pounds compared to 1,853,000 pounds in the same 6 months of 1958 or an increase of 40 percent.

I have written to Representative HERBERT C. BONNER, chairman of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, urging that his committee this fall investigate the impact of these increasing canned shellfish imports upon the prosperity and employment in the American shellfish industry and to make recommendations to Congress as to the most effective way to protect the domestic industry against damage.

Convention of the Ukrainian American Youth Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 4, 1959

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to greet the Ukrainian American Youth Association which is about to hold a convention marking the 10th year of the existence of this great organization. Some 8,000 delegates will shortly meet simultaneously at Spring Glen, N.Y., and in Detroit, Mich. They deserve our good wishes, our encouragement, and our applause. It is events such as these which lend inspiration to the whole movement and which give them the courage to continue their dedication to freedom and independence.

To descendants of the people of the Ukraine the battle against Russian imperialism is no new event. They have struggled against Russian tyranny for 300 years. Indeed, their forthcoming convention heralds the 300th anniversary of the triumphant victory of the Ukrainian Army against the Russians at Konotop, and the 250th anniversary of their tragic defeat by the Russian Army at Poltava. The Ukrainian-American knows perhaps better than any of us the threat and the danger of Russian aggression, because they have fought it when it bore the flag of the Czar, and continue to fight it when it carries the flag of the hammer and sickle. Their persistent spirit and dedication to the cause of freedom should serve as an inspiration to all of us.

I want to especially congratulate those members of my district who will be among those attending this fine and praiseworthy convention. They make up an important segment of the Ukrainian Youth Association. Their voices will be strong in the forthcoming proceedings.

I deeply regret my inability to attend and participate in this event, as I have on numerous occasions in the past. I will be with them in spirit, as I think all of us will be, and I wish them success and fulfillment in their great endeavors.

Lafayette-Marne Day, September 6

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 4, 1959

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, Marquis de Lafayette, whose 202d birth anniversary falls on September 6, was the hero of two continents, the pride of two nations struggling for democracy and freedom.

He was born in 1757 in a chateau in Auvergne, France, and at the time of his death, in 1834, his name had become a household name both in France and in America.

This gallant and gifted son of France, who, in the course of our War of Independence, rendered invaluable services and thereby earned the everlasting gratitude of the American people, was a remarkable man in many ways. In mid-1777, when he asked for and received a commission of major general, the highest rank after the commander in chief, he had not passed his 20th birthday. The youthful and precocious soldier of freedom quickly acquitted himself most honorably on the battlefield. As a resourceful leader and first-rate tactician, his abilities were fully appreciated by Washington.

When his military career in this country came to an end after the Battle of Yorktown he returned to France. There he was made a major general in the French Army in 1781. Later he found himself in the very center of the French Revolution. In 1787 he became a member of the Assembly of Notables, and some time before the Revolution he urged the King to convoke the States-General. During the Revolution he constantly pleaded for personal freedom—for the abolition of arbitrary imprisonment, for religious tolerance, for popular representation, and for the establishment of trial by jury. He was rebuffed by many of the violently Revolutionary leaders. He was sadly disappointed with the course of the Revolution.

For a while he had to flee France, and lived in retirement. In 1824 he revisited the United States at the invitation of President Monroe. Here he was overwhelmed with popular applause, and the Congress voted him the sum of $200,000. He gratefully accepted the gift, returned to his native land. He died on May 20, 1834.

Today in honoring the memory of this great soldier of freedom on his 202d anniversary, we also observe another event falling on the same date, September 6, that is, Marne Day, marking the first battle of the Marne which began 45 years ago early in the First World War and continued for the next 3 days. That battle has often been described as the turning point in that war. By participating in that world struggle and thus insuring the conclusion of that war in favor of democratic forces, we also repaid some of the debt to France which America had incurred at the time of our War of Independence.

In expressing our gratitude for General Lafayette's signal services to this country, and also in expressing our profound admiration for the gallant French soldiers who almost alone fought successfully in the first Battle of the Marne, we pay our respect to their blessed memory.

The Situation in Laos

OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 4, 1959

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement by me with respect to the situation in Laos. The statement calls for renewed efforts for the establishment of a United Nations police force.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR KEATING

The morning radio reports that the Government of Laos has asked the help of the United Nations in curbing the invading Communist forces calls for immediate action by the United States and the U.N. This is a legitimate request of a duly constituted government which is being victimized by outside aggression, and the free world cannot ignore it. No matter how much Peiping and Moscow may proclaim their innocence, the machinations of the international Communist conspiracy are clearly evident in the events in Laos.

I hope the United States will see its way clear to send further aid to the people of Laos in this crisis. I hope, in addition, that the wheels will begin to turn within the United Nations for the creation of a permanent international army which can deal with nibbling Communist aggression such as this. I am today writing to the President urging him to instruct the Secretary of State and our Ambassador to the United Nations to press for positive steps by the U.N. for the establishment of an international police force. Perhaps the crisis in Laos can serve as the spur needed for the U.N. to take this essential step to the building of lasting peace.

One of the most tragic aspects of the request of the Laos Government for U.N. help is that the U.N. does not have any kind of police force which can be rushed into the breach. There is no international army primed for instant action when such conflagrations break out around the world.

It is true, of course, that there is a splendid precedent for using a U.N. group as a buffer between warring states. The special U.N. Emergency Force has wrought miracles in patrolling the Israeli-Egyptian border in the wake of the conflict there. It has provided the cushion which was needed to keep the protagonists apart and promote stability in an area of acute tension.

It is my firm conviction there has been sufficient study and experience concerning a United Nations police force. There is plenty of evidence to show how great a factor it could be in preserving peace. No nation of good will can in good conscience oppose the creation of such a group.

Indeed, I believe we would have every right to question the motives of any nation which would oppose this essential step toward establishing a firm and lasting peace. The United States has repeatedly demonstrated its willingness to participate in an international army for peace and its resolve has been bolstered by resolutions adopted by the Congress.

Certainly, outbreaks of aggression such as we have witnessed in recent years in Korea, Hungary, various places in the Middle East and Far East, and now in Laos, make an international army an imperative the world can ill afford to ignore any longer.

It should, of course, be under the control of the United Nations, ready to move instantly in case of an international emergency at the request of a member government which believes itself threatened by outside aggression or subversion directed by another country.

In a world contracted by speedy communications and transportation, in a world in which so many nations possess the terribly destructive weapons of modern warfare, any international conflict—no matter how localized—can spread like wildfire and thus present a real threat to world stability. The only feasible answer to this challenge to the peace of the world is a U.N. force capable of so spreading an international mantle over an embattled area as to inhibit—if not directly to prevent the spreading of any local conflict.

A U.N. police force need not be a huge, all-powerful army. It might not number more than 50,000 or 60,000. It might perhaps be best to establish a firm nucleus at all times centered under one command, with other forces in the individual countries available upon call.

The smaller nations should form the backbone of this international group. This will prevent the bigger powers running the risk of being dragged into a nuclear conflict which could doom all mankind.

Such an international army could not—and should not—fight wars. But it could serve as an effective deterrent to hostilities, could be a focus for the moral opinion of the world, and could serve numerous practical buffer uses in observation, patrol, and guard duty between hostile states.

Because of the dangers inherent in man's vast technological and material progress, because of the repeatedly demonstrated determination of some powers to stir up trouble at every opportunity, we must search with imagination and foresight for the answers to the enigmas of world peace. Today we have too little of either—at a time when we stand in desperate need of both.

Time is running short. Each new crisis brings us closer to the potential horrors of world war III. The next international brush fire may set off that world conflagration if the nations of the world do not rise to the occasion.

A permanent United Nations police force provides a new, decisive means by which the nations of the world which sincerely believe in peace can provide the machinery to quarantine regional conflicts and Communist military probes, and thus better insure their solution. It would be fitting for the United States, with its demonstrated dedication to creating a peace based on justice and morality, and with its repeatedly affirmed belief in the United Nations, to take the lead in this great task.

In the meantime, I am extremely hopeful our Government will do everything possible to give aid and comfort to the embattled Government of Laos. I hope steps can be taken within the U.N. to establish a temporary, emergency police unit to come to the aid of that nation as it attempts to resist the Communist. I hope ways and means will be found to send additional American aid to Laos. Clearly, the United States and the free world cannot stand idly by while Laos is engulfed in the tide of the international Communist conspiracy.

Ill-Considered Threat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VICTOR A. KNOX
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 4, 1959

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following news report that I have sent to my constituents in the 11th Congressional District of Michigan:

Much has been written and said during the last few weeks about labor reform legislation, especially the Landrum-Griffin bill. I have received hundreds of letters, telegrams, and post cards on this subject from all parts of the Nation. None of these contained a threatening tenor, except for the form letter I have received from James B. Carey, president of the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers. So that my constituents may be informed in this matter, I am including a copy of his letter and setting out my reply to him. His threatening communication is a reflection on the citizens of the United States and an un-American attempt to intimidate the Congress of the United States.

AUGUST 18, 1959.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Only you know, in the privacy of your own conscience, whether you carefully considered the possible consequences of the Landrum-Griffin bill when you voted for it on August 13, 1959. If you did, and realized that it is a punitive, repressive measure intended to weaken all labor unions and thereby all working men and women, you have much to answer for. If you did not, and merely yielded to the pressures of the chamber of commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers, your guilt is perhaps even greater.

You should realize now, if you did not during the heat of battle, that this vindictive assault on the labor movement will, in the long run, prove to your constituents that you are less interested in individual rights and democracy than in property rights and the concentration of power in the hands of big business.

You may believe that you are safe in such action because organized labor is relatively weak in your district, and cannot call you to account for the damage you have sought to do to it. You may be right—at the moment.

We wish to assure you, however, that we shall do all in our power to prove to the working men and women in your district that you have cast your lot against them and they should therefore take appropriate action at the ballot box.

Very truly yours,

JAMES B. CAREY, President.

AUGUST 21, 1959.

DEAR MR. CAREY: I have received your form letter of August 18 endeavoring to intimidate me because of my favorable vote on August 12, 1959, in support of the Landrum-Griffin bill, which also was supported by President Eisenhower as well as by 303 of my colleagues out of the total membership of 426 in the House of Representatives.

It is interesting to note that you have described this legislation as "a punitive and repressive measure." This phrase characterizes the tenor of your letter. In my judgment your action constitutes a grave and intemperate misuse of the money of the rank and file of labor union members. By your ill-considered threat you are exposing the labor boss practice of the denial of the basic rights and democratic processes of your union members. A threat from you is no more terrifying to me than would be a threat from Mr. Hoffa, although I believe even he would be inclined to use better judgment than you have demonstrated.

By your act you have caused me to realize more than ever that I was correct in voting for the Landrum-Griffin bill. I am sure my voting record has proven to my constituency that I am interested in individual rights and democracy more than in the concentration of power in the hands of big business, regardless of whether that big business be the management boss or the labor boss.

The people of the 11th Congressional District of Michigan will not yield to the unthinking dudgeon of any labor leader when they are exercising the right to mark their ballot in secret for the candidates of their choice. Similarly, I would not, and did not yield to any pressures from the National Association of Manufacturers and the chamber of commerce, as you allege, when I cast my vote for the Landrum-Griffin bill.

I have always supported legislation that would protect the rights of labor union members and would rid the unions of the practices of corruption, breach of trust, gangsterism, violence, and abuses of power. The political hoodlumism that you imply will be brought to bear against me does not dismay me, and I am sure it will not be persuasive with the thinking people of my congressional district.

In order that my constituency may be aware of your activities I am sending a copy of your letter and my reply to all individuals on my mailing list. I respect the intelligence of the people whom I have the honor to represent, and know that they too will realize more than ever the real need for the enactment of the provisions of the Landrum-Griffin bill.

Yours truly,

VICTOR A. KNOX,
Member of Congress.

Settlement of Bethlehem Steel Co. Dispute With Shipbuilding Workers Is Vital to Our Country's Defense

OF
HON. DANIEL B. BREWSTER OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 4, 1959

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, my esteemed colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURKE] has done the Members of the House of Representatives and the public a signal service by forcefully calling to our attention the present stalemate in contract negotiations between the Bethlehem Steel Co. and the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America, AFL–CIO.

It has been pointed out that the Bethlehem Steel Co. operates 8 shipyards along the Atlantic coast employing some 17,000 men who represent the core of shipbuilding know-how in the eastern United States. One of these yards is located in my district at Sparrows Point, Md., and I, personally, know many of the men employed there who have devoted their entire lives to the shipbuilding industry. The Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America, AFL–CIO, is one of the country's most highly respected unions. Its members have proved time and again that they are willing to place our country's strength and well-being above their own economic interest.

The union's contract with Bethlehem Steel expired on July 31, 1959. Prior to that time the union's representatives had begun efforts to negotiate a new collective bargaining agreement with the company. The company has presented the union with demands that the union simply could not accept. Principal among these demands is the threatened elimination of the seniority rights of many highly skilled craftsmen.

I believe that the shipyard workers have given strong evidence of their desire to bargain in good faith. They have proposed that the expired agreement be extended for a brief period in order that negotiations could continue. This offer was refused by the company. The union then offered to submit both the company's demands and the union's proposals to arbitration. This offer was also rejected by the company. The union members have further shown their good faith by continuing on the job despite the fact they do not have a contract.

This is particularly significant because in many of its yards Bethlehem shipbuilding is engaged in vitally important work for the U.S. Navy. At this time Bethlehem shipyards are building the nuclear missile carrier Long Beach and the nuclear frigate Bainbridge. At the same time one of its yards is converting the missile firing cruiser Springfield. We simply cannot afford to lose any more ground in our efforts to match and surpass the growing Soviet military machine.

I call upon both labor and management to join in full and open collective bargaining in keeping with our established tradition of fair play. It has been suggested that the House Armed Services Committee's subcommittee on defense activities conduct an immediate factfinding investigation. There is ample precedent for this step because the same subcommittee investigated a similar situation in 1954. The previous investigation produced favorable results and should the present situation continue, I, as a member of the Armed Services Committee, will support the request for committee action.

I am further concerned by this situation because recently two of our Atlantic coast shipbuilding concerns lost sizable contracts to California shipbuilders. These contracts were lost because of an unfair and artificial 6 percent advantage given California firms by an archaic section of the Merchant Marine Act. I have introduced H.R. 8176, which will repeal this unfair clause. If the east coast firms are to compete successfully with other areas, with or without this unfair advantage presently enjoyed by some, we must have fair and stable labor-management relations.

We must also consider the absolute necessity of maintaining our pool of highly skilled and experienced shipyard workers. The collective know-how of these men is vital to our national security. The dissipation and eventual loss of these special skills could have a far-reaching effect on our country's ability to produce today's nuclear vessels.

OF

HON. CHARLES O. PORTER

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 4, 1959

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, last month I read with interest a full-page advertisement which the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. placed in Life magazine August 3. It was entitled "Why in Heaven Don't You Speak Out on Inflation?"

Naturally I was interested. I estimate that millions of readers saw that appeal.

I believe this ad is part of a campaign being waged by big business as a part of the antediluvian thinking of the Republican Party. I have replied to other such ads and I have sent copies to the Bureau of Internal Revenue to see if they are legitimately paid for as a business expense.

Now no one is against a strong, sound, and stable dollar.

No one likes unreasonable demands.

No one approves excessive spending.

Neither do we approve of child beating or the kicking of dogs.

My point, Mr. Speaker, is that this ad, like too many appearing in newspapers and magazines these days, deals with glittering generalities. The vague proposal or statement is a favorite weapon of Madison Avenue.

I have written to the president of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., Mr. Frederick R. Kappel, to offer some comments about his company's participation in what appears to be a big phony anti-inflation campaign.

The advertisement and my letter to Mr. Kappel follow.

AN INTERESTING LETTER SAID, "WHY IN HEAVEN DON'T YOU SPEAK OUT ON INFLATION?"

I have received a number of letters from men and women who are concerned about inflation. One A.T. & T. shareowner asked, "Why in heaven don't you speak out on this subject?"

The letter went on to say, "If you would alert the 1,625,000 shareowners and 700,000 employees to the facts about inflation, they would help spread the news."

I warmly agree that it is essential to alert more people to the dangers of inflation and we in the Bell System are speaking up and speaking out at every opportunity.

In recent articles and bulletins to employees, the Bell System companies have discussed the threat which inflation poses to the purchasing power of the dollar and to savings, insurance, and pensions.

At the annual meeting of A.T. & T. shareowners I pointed out that inflation has been a tough problem in the telephone business. But we have not just talked about the problem—we have developed more efficient equipment and introduced many economies of operation. It is worth noting that the price of telephone service generally has gone up less since World War II than most other things.

But we know that the forces of inflation are far too widespread and powerful for any one individual or business to stem them singlehanded.

This brings me to the question that I believe so many are asking: "How can I help?" In these ways, it seems to me:

By giving spoken and written support to those who are working for a strong, sound, and stable dollar.

By opposing unreasonable demands, excessive spending, and schemes that add fuel to the inflationary fire.

Your friends and associates, and especially your representatives in Congress, are entitled to your constructive views.

For our part, we will continue to fight inflation by pushing research hard and effecting economies in our business. And by speaking out against this threat to the people and the country.

FREDERICK R. KAPPEL,
President, American Telephone & Telegraph Co.
NEW YORK, N.Y.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., Sept. 3, 1959.

Mr. FREDERICK R. KAPPEL,
President, American Telephone & Telegraph Co., New York, N.Y.

DEAR MR. KAPPEL: Your full-page advertisement in the August 3 issue of Life magazine, entitled "Why in Heaven Don't You Speak Out on Inflation?" appears to be part of a concerted effort by big business corporations to influence public policy through paid ads in national magazines.

As I read your advertisement I could not help but reflect that you must have a pretty poor opinion of the intelligence of the American people to think that they could be influenced by so vacuous a statement. You are for a strong, sound, and stable dollar. So are we all. What specifically, then, is it that you would have us speak out against?

You urge the public to oppose unreasonable demands. But what the unreasonable demands are that should be opposed you do not tell us. Has it occurred to you that many of the readers of the advertisement might regard putting pressure upon governmental regulatory agencies to establish rates that add considerably to the cost of telephone service as falling into the category of unreasonable demands? And, you know, rate hikes are also inflationary.

The recent order of the Federal Communications Commission, cutting long-distance telephone rates by $50 million a year, would seem to indicate that if you were genuinely concerned about containing the forces of inflation you would make every effort to achieve a downward revision of the toll charges to your customers without putting the Government into position of having to do it for you.

Your urge us to oppose excessive spending. Here again you are deliberately vague. Surely, it is not your intention that the consumer should curtail his expenditures for telephone services. I presume that what you do have in mind is the reduction of governmental expenditures. Shall we curtail outlays for national defense, foreign aid, highways, schools, etc.? Shall the letters which you urge the public to write aim to support those Members in Congress who wish to maintain a lid on interest rates so as to keep down the cost of servicing the Government debt? Unfortunately, you furnish us with no guidance. Certainly you would want us to be discriminating. Otherwise the public might end up by unwittingly urging the adoption of proposals advanced by the Democratic Party rather than those advocated by the Republican administration, in support of which you are using the funds of the A.T. & T. for paid advertisements.

What we need from business leadership is more enlightenment rather than obfuscation, less of an appeal to the emotions and more to the rational consideration of great national issues. Madison Avenue techniques for getting people to purchase commodities are hardly the tools for promoting understanding and for arriving at intelligent decisions in matters of public policy.

As one of the largest business corporations in America, the A.T. & T. has joined the ranks of what is essentially an antidemocratic movement among certain top business leaders who are determined to employ the funds of their corporations for the purpose of influencing public opinion. Have you ascertained how many of your 1,625,000 shareholders would endorse your campaign to frighten Americans about inflation? I am certain that there are a great many stockholders who do not share your views on political and economic issues. They would, of course, not question your right as a private citizen to publicly express your views. But it is another matter when you use the name and funds of your company to foist on the public your personal opinions as to current events. The taxpayer has also a right to be aggrieved when these paid advertisements are charged off as a corporate expense.

You must have noticed, Mr. Kappel, that 2 weeks after you felt compelled through your advertisement to alert the American people on the threat of inflation, the second report of what is popularly known as the Nixon Anti-inflation Committee was released. In contrast to the first report, issued only 7 weeks earlier, which stated that "our economy is now at a critical juncture urgently requiring action to forestall inflation," the second one contained no warning about the imminence of inflation. In the words of Business Week (Aug. 22), the former bristled with a sense of crisis with respect to inflation, while the latter was described as playing down inflation talk, with greater attention given to economic growth. This suggests that before you commit yourself to another full-page advertisement you had better check with the Vice President as to what is the latest official line. In that way you might get the maximum benefit out of your advertising expenditures.

May I remind you, Mr. Kappel, that during the past year when the administration was clamoring vociferously that inflation was so pressing and immediate a threat, fellow legislators with whose thinking I agree have pointed out that there was little basis in fact to support the administration's claims; that the Consumer Price Index had remained more or less at a constant level throughout the year; that most of the increases in the price level had occurred during and shortly after wars, when too many dollars were chasing too few goods; and that in view of our great responsibilities as the leading nation of the free world and of our neglected needs at home, it was imperative that the administration concentrate its efforts on promoting the acceleration of the American rate of economic growth.

I can only draw one conlusion from the anti-inflation campaign. The term "inflation" has come to be a slogan employed by conservative elements to defeat any legislation which they look upon with disfavor. It is a weapon used to frighten us away from measures designed to improve the lot of the common man through programs for the removal of slum and blighted areas, for strengthening our school systems, and for expenditures on much needed public services and facilities. It also has had the unfortunate result of taking dangerous risks with the future of our national security through inadequate support of much needed defense expenditures.

Sincerely,

CHARLES O. PORTER,
Member of Congress.

Report of U.S. Commission on Civil Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 4, 1959

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement by me with respect to the report of the United States Commission on Civil Rights.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR KEATING

The report of the Commission on Civil Rights, although not yet officially released, already has stirred violent verbal blasts from some quarters. This reaction is not unexpected since the work of the Commission has been subjected to obstruction by its opponents from its very inception. It is obvious that there are some people who do not want the facts with regard to civil rights to be studied and discussed. These people are determined to leave no stone unturned in their conspiracy to prevent information on these vital issues from reaching the American people.

I have reviewed the report of the Civil Rights Commission with great interest. It is a balanced, well-documented analysis of the legal and moral problems in the way of realizing equality under the law in accordance with our democratic tradition. These problems are not sectional or partisan. They should be of concern to all Americans throughout the country who respect the Constitution.

I can well understand some differences of opinion with regard to the specific recommendations of the Commission. I cannot, however, condone the blanket condemnation and venom which have already been heaped upon its work by its diehard opponents. Nor can I sympathize with any effort to prevent Americans from exercising their sacred right to vote or from enjoying the same privileges under our laws regardless of their race, creed or national origin.

In my opinion, the Commission's recommendations for the most part are very moderate. Its first recommendation, for example, is that the Bureau of the Census be authorized and directed to undertake a nationwide compilation of registration and voting statistics. I thought we in this country had long passed the day when we would consider such statistic-gathering activities by the Bureau of the Census as un-American. The Commission also recommends that voting records shall be preserved and be made public provided that all care is taken to preserve the secrecy of the ballot. This seems to me to be an eminently reasonable proposal. There also are recommendations with respect to appointment of temporary Federal registrars, for prosecution of persons who under color of law deprive individuals of an opportunity to register and vote, and for the enforcement of the Commission's present subpena powers, which would certainly deserve Congress' support. The only dissent from any of these recommendations is by Commissioner Battle, the former Governor of Virginia. The other Commissioners, Chairman Hannah, president of Michigan State University; Robert Storey, the dean of the Southern Methodist University Law School; Doyle Carlton, former Governor of Florida; Father Hesburgh, the president of the University of Notre Dame; and George M. Johnson, former dean of the Howard University School of Law; were unanimous in their support of these proposals.

The Commission's report deals with housing and education as well as with voting rights and, of course, there are some differences among the various Commissioners with respect to specific proposals made in these fields. This in no way serves to undermine the importance of the Commission's report. Rather, it serves to emphasize the necessity for continuing the great work in which these men are engaged so that further light can be shed on the many difficult issues which are faced in the field of civil rights. These men, all of them distinguished Americans, are engaged in a great dialogue on a subject which goes to the core of our American way of life. Discussions and reports can pave the way for an era of ever-increasing freedom and liberty for all Americans. It has always been my creed that no American can feel secure in his freedom unless the freedom of all Americans is safeguarded. This appears also to be the dominant theme of the Commission's report. I applaud the results the Commission has thus far accomplished. Under no circumstances should we even consider adjournment until the authority for continuation of the Commission has been assured.

The Federal Government Can Save Tax Dollars—Move Its Operations to Depressed Areas

OF
HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 4, 1959

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, last week the proposal to reduce appropriations for schools in federally impacted areas was rejected by a House Education and Labor Subcommittee. The decision was disappointing to supporters of the administration's program to cut down on unnecessary spending. It was another blatant refusal to take a stand against inflationary practices.

The recommendations of Dr. Arthur S. Flemming, Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, were modest enough, with the principal item providing for a 50-percent decrease in aid to school districts where parents of students work for the Government in another jurisdiction. A district in point is Montgomery County, Md., the residence of many men and women who are employed by the Federal Government in the District of Columbia. Montgomery County, which prides itself as one of the wealthiest—if not the wealthiest—counties in the United States, comes in for a handout of about $3 million this year under Public Law 874, which one of the laws the administration sought to modify in the interest of economy.

The total cost of the prevailing program amounts to $225 million annually, with beneficiaries including numerous school districts serving permanent military bases. Under the administration plan, appropriations would have been reduced by almost 30 percent the first year, with additional savings scheduled for succeeding years. At a time when the general public is alarmed at the high cost of Government that is constantly reducing purchasing power of the wage earner's dollar, it is extremely unfortunate that an opportunity to save more than $60 million annually was dismissed by the subcommittee. Yet it is encouraging that members considering the amendments submitted this observation in their report:

> It is the feeling of the subcommittee that certain modifications of these programs may be desirable.
> For that reason, the subcommittee plans to take up the question again early in the next session with the intention of making specific recommendations.

Mr. Speaker, it is my firm hope that the subcommittee will in its wisdom make a complete reevaluation of the impacted area gratuities in order that the taxpaying public may at long last obtain relief from the current imposition on the Federal Treasury. Meanwhile, Congress can make a distinct contribution to the cause of economy if demands of local citizens are determined before sites for further Government installations are selected.

As Representative of the 22d Congressional District of Pennsylvania, I should like to invite my colleagues to inspect the advantages of Armstrong, Cambria, and Indiana Counties as locales for military bases and Federal offices. Although our per capita income cannot be compared with that of Montgomery County, we should be happy to provide the necessary school facilities for children of Government workers if they are located in our district. We resent having to contribute to the education of students in communities that have pleaded for Government construction and then insist on subsidies to provide for normal services and facilities.

If Montgomery County cannot afford to pay for its own schools, give us some of the new Government offices that are contemplated for the future. We would appreciate the employment opportunities and steady paychecks that come with them. In our part of the country we have thousands of men and women wholly competent of serving in whatever capacities are needed. They will welcome the economic stimulation which Government payrolls provide, and in turn they will meet whatever tax assessments are necessary to maintain our schools.

The 22d Congressional District has ample space, excellent transportation facilities, and a climate far superior to that of Montgomery County. I suggest that Congress consider these advantages before deciding upon further new construction. We would be happy to be classified as a federally impacted area without permitting our school system to become a public charge.

Reciprocal Treatment for Tariff Concessions

OF
HON. RICHARD M. SIMPSON
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 4, 1959

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I submit that orderly foreign commerce conducted on a basis of reciprocity and mutual trust is a goal worth striving for, and I would suggest to the State Department that one way to achieve this worthy objective would be for the United States to insist on reciprocal treatment for every tariff concession granted by our negotiators.

Perhaps we have a right to hope that the State Department will recognize the merits of this policy in time for the next big tariff bargaining festival to be held under the auspices of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in 1961.

The adoption of such a policy, however, would mark a sharp departure from our present practice of tariff giveaways, a procedure to which our diplomats have clung through thick and thin for a quarter of a century. Time after time they have successfully resisted the efforts of embattled American producers and jobholders to encourage real reciprocity in our international commerce.

Another instance of this one-sided give-and-take—we give and they take—came to light this week in the pages of two different newspapers.

The New York Times, long-time advocate of freer trade, reported the tremendous boom in the transitor radio industry in Japan. Exports this year will be more than doubled over 1958, the Times disclosed, and no less than 60 percent of the 4 million transitor sets to be shipped abroad by the Japanese will land in the United States.

Japan's next biggest customer will receive 10 percent of total exports, or about one-sixth as many as are crowded into the U.S. market.

That is half of the story. The other half appears on the pages of the Journal of Commerce, another booster of freer trade. There we learn that the United States plans to talk once again with the Japanese about their discrimination against goods from the dollar area.

The press report goes on to list those products from the dollar area that are denied automatic import license approval. The 10 items on the list include lard, cattle, hides, beef tallow, soy beans, pig iron, and steel, and copper scrap.

Besides that, says the news story, the Japanese discriminate against automobiles made in the United States in favor of small cars manufactured in Europe.

This, of course, illustrates only a single instance of bogus reciprocity in our foreign trade. There are numerous others everywhere we look. The British Prime Minister, in a televised conversation with the President of the United States, appealed for more lenient treatment of British woolen imports, implying to millions of viewers that the United States had quite a way to go to match Britain's liberal trade outlook.

The Prime Minister did not say "ease up on our woolens and we will ease up on your automobiles or electrical equipment." He did not suggest "give our woolen manufacturers a break and we will liberalize our token import plan." In short, he did not say "give us something and we will give you something in return." Not at all. He simply said, politely, "give us something."

Australia offers another case study of bogus reciprocity in action.

In 2 years, 1956 to 1958, the Australians increased their shipments of mutton to the American market by thirtyfold—from a trifle more than 300,000 pounds to more than 14 million pounds. And in the first 6 months of 1959 these imports jumped to 23 million pounds.

Two years ago Australia sent us less than 6 million pounds of beef and veal. Last year these shipments reached 17 million pounds, and in the first half of 1959, they rose to a staggering 83 million pounds.

But what is happening in Australia's domestic market? One development of certain interest to American industry is the appeal of Australian producers of internal combustion engines for a protective tariff.

Engines and engine parts, it seems, are the only parts of motor vehicles which are not now favored by import duties. Australian producers are anxious to remedy this alleged defect. They want a 42½ percent tariff on imported engines and engine parts—but that would apply only to the United States and other countries outside of the Commonwealth preferential tariff system. Nations inside the Commonwealth family would only have to pay a 35 percent tariff to place their engines in the Australian market.

No one knows better than those who recognize its false implications what an effective word "reciprocal" really is. It is rich in meaning; it raises powerful images of faith and trust and mutual responsibility; it is the Golden Rule at work in international relations.

And, sad to say, it represents a picture of foreign trade as illusory, as misleading, as unfair to American industry and labor, as if the entire issue had been distorted and sentimentalized and glamorized in a Hollywood scenario.

Our Government is now making preparations to take part in the next multilateral tariff conference to be sponsored by GATT.

By preparing to take part, I mean specifically that the Government is scanning American industry for products on which to offer new tariff concessions. Experts in the State Department, the Commerce Department, the Agriculture Department, the Tariff Commission, and other agencies are working to put together our country's official bargaining list—some choose to call it, on the basis of painful past experience, the sacrificial offering list.

Nevertheless, this is a highly appropriate time to urge those who are responsible for these negotiations, as well as for the preparatory research that is already underway, to spend some time reexamining this question of reciprocity.

A bargaining list is one thing; what our negotiators do with it when they sit down with representatives of other nations is something else. As long as we have committed ourselves to the disadvantages of multilateral negotiation, let us try to make the best of it. Let our negotiators insist on payment in kind; for one thing, let us stop extending outright tariff reductions in return for somebody else's promise that they will not raise their tariffs on our products.

In my opinion, this practice of granting tariff concessions in return for the other fellow's agreement to stand pat is tantamount to saying, "We will give you something if you promise not to take something away from us that we already have." It is like giving away your car in order to persuade the other fellow not to raise the price of the house he is going to sell you.

Yet, this is exactly what we have done in previous negotiations. Perhaps we have learned our lesson. For the sake of our American economy, I most certainly hope so.

Law Enforcement Officers Deserve Better Public Support

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 4, 1959

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address which I delivered before the Tennessee Law Enforcement Officers Association at Knoxville on August 28, 1959.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a pleasure to be back here in Knoxville this evening and to discuss a subject of utmost concern to you as law enforcement officers, to me as a legislator, and to all Americans as responsible citizens.

Crime is a cancer that destroys the minds and the souls of its practitioners and extorts severe penalties from all of us.

Approximately 3 million crimes will be committed in the United States this year. In order to meet this menace about $22 billion will be spent by local and Federal law enforcement agents. That's more than half the amount that this Nation will spend this year for our national defense. It is 140 times the amount that has been asked by the administration to implement the National Education Defense Act. For every dollar that is contributed to our churches 10 will be spent to combat crime. From a tax standpoint $22 billion cost every citizen $128.

These startling financial figures do not represent the greatest expense that crime inflicts. Most serious of all is the loss in human resources, the corruption of our youth, the weakening of our moral fiber.

When we are locked in a global struggle that threatens our ideals and ideas we cannot afford to see our future strength sapped by the corruption of our youth. I am sure you are well aware of our juvenile delinquency problem and the central part it plays in the whole crime movement. During 1959 more than 1 million young people will get in trouble with the police. More than 50 percent of all those arrested for crime against property will be youths under 21 years of age. The rate of juvenile arrests is growing 2½ times faster than the rate of population growth in this age classification.

Crime does not pay—although a few hoodlums make temporary financial profits. But crime certainly does cost.

Organizations such as yours lead the counterattack against this national menace. The first line of defense against the criminal is the man with the badge who walks the beat or cruises in a patrol car; the sheriffs and officers and policemen who face the gunman, the burglar, and the mugger and at times give their lives in defense of law and order.

ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS DESERVE SUPPORT

You are doing a determined and courageous job, and your ranks are filled with able, dedicated men. But you can't do it all by yourselves. Your efforts are the central ones, but they must derive added strength from other sources. An effective anticrime campaign is one in which America's law enforcement officers represent the link between local civic activity and national coordination. You must have the support and interest of the individual citizens which you are protecting. And your efforts would be greatly enhanced by an exchange of ideas and information between various law enforcement agencies through a national crime commission.

Let's briefly consider these two anticrime elements.

During the hearings before the Senate Crime Investigating Committee in 1950–51, of which I was chairman, we found that the American public was dangerously uninformed and apathetic about the pervasive presence of crime. We met many policemen during our investigations—men who told us of the difficulties they have in enforcing the law because of a lack of support from the law-abiding citizens of their community; men who told us how pressure to obtain special consideration or favors breaks down the whole system of law enforcement.

The ugly facts that splashed across the television set of the Nation served to arouse the American people and rid them of their apathy about the crime problem. The hearings stirred a good deal of anticrime activity in the form of volunteer citizens groups, new crime commissions, tightening of State laws, and congressional legislation.

NEED OF CONSTANT PUBLIC INTEREST

But unfortunately much of this activity, particularly the concern of local citizens, has been sporadic and needs dramatic stimulants. An honest and courageous police officer is priceless even as the children and adults he protects. There may be an occasional bad apple, but the vast majority of our law enforcement population represents America's most dedicated men and women. It is the responsibility of all our citizens to see that our anticrime leaders receive adequate salaries and work in conditions unimpaired by dissension or patronage.

Our law enforcement officers need to be better paid, and they need to have more adequate security when they retire or when they are disabled. Unless we can provide these incentives it is going to be hard to maintain the high caliber of people entrusted with the enforcement of our laws. I think there is a duty on the part of the Federal, State, and local governments in this connection. A great many State and local violations are also violations of Federal statutes. Local law enforcement officers very frequently assist in the enforcement of Federal statutes as well as State laws. Many times they may be killed or disabled while doing so. So I think it is proper that the Federal Government join State and local communities in a program of seeing that our law enforcement officers have better protection.

With this in mind I have filed a bill that will extend the provision of the Federal Employees' Compensation Act to cover State and local law enforcement officers when they are killed or injured while enforcing any Federal law. The bill provides for payment to the extent of one-third of the amount set forth in the Federal Employees' Compensation Act. It is contemplated that the State and local governments would make similar provisions if they have not already done so. I believe that a joint undertaking would help us retain good men and women in the law enforcement service. I believe it is equitable from the viewpoint of the Federal Government. The bill that I have introduced is as follows:

A bill to extend the provisions of the Federal Employees' Compensation Act to State and local law enforcement officers who are killed or injured while, or as a direct result of, enforcing any Federal law

"Whereas it is in the public interest to coordinate the efforts of the Federal, State, and local law enforcement agencies in order to improve the enforcement of laws; and

"Whereas many activities which constitute violations of State laws also constitute violations of Federal laws; and

"Whereas State and local law enforcement officers frequently assist in the enforcement of Federal criminal statutes; and

"Whereas State and local law enforcement officers and their families frequently are not adequately protected in the event any such officer is killed or injured and disabled while engaged in the enforcement of laws; and

"Whereas it is the policy of the Congress that the Federal Government contribute toward the provision of a more adequate measure of protection for State and local law enforcement officers and their families in cases where any such officer is killed or injured and disabled while engaged in enforcing any Federal law: Therefore

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a), except as otherwise provided by section 2, the provisions of the Federal Employees' Compensation Act, as amended, shall apply in the case of any State law enforcement officer (as defined in subsection (b)) who is killed or injured while engaged in, or as a direct result of having engaged in, the enforcement of any Federal law in like manner as if such law enforcement officer were an "employee" as defined in section 40(b) of such Act.

"(b) For the purposes of this Act, the term 'State law enforcement officer' means any sheriff, deputy sheriff, policeman, constable, town marshal, or other officer or employee of any State or political subdivision thereof who is authorized to apprehend and arrest criminals and who is charged with the duty of suppressing criminal activity, apprehending criminals and persons suspected of crimes, preserving the peace, and protecting life and property.

"SEC. 2. The amount of any compensation payable under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act by reason of the provisions of this Act shall be equal to one-third of the amount which would be payable if the individual to whom or on whose account such compensation is payable were an 'employee' as defined in section 40(b) of the Federal Employees' Compensation Act, as amended."

While crime is largely a local problem there is much that can be done nationally to assist our law enforcement agents. Since our investigations in 1950–51 Congress has passed many bills dealing with various types of criminal activity. This legislation, while beneficial, generally can deal only with specific types and certain manifestations of crime. It cannot strike mortal blows at the broad evil that only occasionally hits the headlines, but usually is carried on quietly down the street.

NATIONAL CRIME COMMISSION

Toward this end, I am planning to introduce again in the Senate a bill to establish a National Crime Commission. This Commission, similar to the ones I've proposed in past sessions of Congress, would act as a clearinghouse for the various Federal agencies and anticrime organizations spread throughout the country. It would not interfere with the fine work of the FBI but would supplement it.

It would study the manner and extent to which organized crime uses the facilities of interstate commerce, and evaluate the adequacy of Federal laws dealing with this problem. The Commission would submit recommendations based on its findings, coordinate the activities of various law enforcement agencies, and expedite exchange of information between such groups.

I believe such an organization would provide elements that are often missing from our anticrime movements: unity and permanence. The unity would be supplied by the organizations' coordination of anticrime efforts and cross-ventilation of ideas and techniques. The permanence would come from its continuing presence as a source of information and a sponsor of new programs.

Local encouragement and national cooperation—these are the elements that have been largely absent in past campaigns against crime. In the past 8 years there have been significant improvements along these lines. Present crime rates show clearly that there is much more to be done.

Award of Paul Bunyan Award to Senators Capehart and Sparkman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 4, 1959

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, recently the distinguished senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] and I were honored by the Lumbermen's Forest in Israel, an organization in Pennsylvania consisting of people directly or indirectly concerned with home building. This organization honored Senator CAPEHART and me by giving to each of us the Paul Bunyan annual award. The award was made to each of us according to the wording of the plaque "in recognition of his foresight and unrelenting effort in sponsoring legislation for a progressive housing policy aiming to provide the finest housing in the world for the American people." I deemed it a great honor and I am sure that the same was true for Senator CAPEHART.

On that occasion I made a brief talk. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Senator CAPEHART, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, I am overwhelmed by your courtesy in doing me this great honor. I think that even Paul Bunyan himself would have been impressed with the dimensions of your generosity.

It is fitting that there should be events, such as this, celebrated in the name of Paul Bunyan. His name is symbolic of the resilience and audacity of a frontier society. This frontier spirit is well expressed by Carl Sandburg when he says that—

"The people will live on.
The learning and blundering people will live on.
They will be tricked and sold and again sold
And go back to the nourishing earth for rootholds,
The people so peculiar in renewal and comeback,
You can't laugh off their capacity to take it."

Daniel G. Hoffman quotes those few lines from Sandburg and observes that the poet finds in the Bunyan stories, "conquests of terror by laughter, of despair by comic ingenuity, and the victory of the indomitable human spirit over adversity."

No task was too great for Paul Bunyan, nor for the indomitable people who created his legend, nor for the people who came after him—both here and in freedom-loving lands abroad.

I wish that we had a Paul Bunyan to take over the task of housing the American people. This is a task which will require all our talents and all our determination.

According to the Bureau of the Census, in 1957 13 million homes in this Nation were substandard—this represents 24 percent, or 1 out of 4 of the 55,340,000 dwelling units in the continental United States. In 1950, the Census Bureau reported 16 million substandard dwelling units, so that in those 7 years we made some progress, but very little indeed when one considers the high level of prosperity during the period.

Why is this?

The simple answer is that we are not producing enough housing units to meet the need. We are not adding enough new units to force abandonment of many existing units which are worn out and have long ago ceased to be fit for human occupancy.

The formation of new nonfarm households over the past few years has amounted to about 1 million units per year. Housing starts, according to the Bureau of Labor statistics, have been a little over 1 million units per year. This is just enough to take care of new household formation.

We must increase production of housing in the future. We have a dual job. First, to produce enough new units to accommodate the big family formation expansion expected to take place in the mid-1960's; and second, to replace the old, wornout, and dilapidated units still occupied.

The babies of the midforties will be the new heads of households of the midsixties, so it requires only simple arithmetic to estimate the probable new family formation for that period. In addition to the need to build enough units to meet the requirements of new household formation and to replace existing substandard units, there is an ever-pressing demand for improvement in the quality of housing consistent with our existing standard of living.

The construction of homes priced to meet the growing needs of larger families is another pressure for expansion of housing construction.

With all these demand factors in mind, we have some rough idea of the job ahead of us. With the right product and the right price, housing production of the mid-1960's could easily double that produced today.

The question is—Can it be done? Do we have the tools to produce housing units within the next 10 years at a rate double the present performance?

I know what Paul Bunyan's answer would be—and my answer is the same. We can produce as much housing as we are willing to produce—and we should never rest until every family in this Nation has a decent home in a suitable living environment.

It is also fitting that Paul Bunyan should be a symbol for your efforts to encourage land reclamation and the development of forests in Israel. For Israel is indeed a frontier, even as our own land was—not so many years ago. Perhaps this work you do through your committee is in partial fulfillment of God's word, when He spoke through Isaiah to say:

"I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys: I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water.

"I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah tree, and the myrtle, and the oil tree; I will set in the desert the fir tree, and the pine, and the box tree together."

You in this assembly, and others all over the country, are helping Israel survive under difficulties almost beyond imagination. Israel is an area no larger than the State of Massachusetts, bordered on three sides by unfriendly nations, and suffering from a minimum of natural and climatic resources. We are helping this tiny nation to remain a lamp of freedom, in a part of the world besieged by Communist pressures, in spite of the many handicaps her people face.

What has already been accomplished toward making Israel economically independent is almost unbelievable.

Land under cultivation increased from 400,000 acres in 1949 to 950,000 in 1957. To restore these vast areas to fruitfulness was in many instances a matter of digging stones out of rough terrain by hand. Most of it was done, however, by modern agricultural equipment supplied in large part by help from people in the United States.

In a great program of reforestation in which your organization has played such an important part there have been planted 27,585,000 trees.

Even with this tremendous development of her land resources Israel supplies only about 70 percent of her overall agricultural needs.

Industrial production has increased by more than 300 percent since 1949. Productivity per worker has risen about 50 percent.

This greater industrial production gave a needed boost to Israel's exports, which quintupled during the decade. Exports totaled $200 million in 1957, and reached $250 million last year.

All this was achieved despite a crippling security burden, an Arab boycott, and the absorption of 900,000 immigrants.

We Americans, it seems to me, must assume these fundamental facts about Israel:

1. It is a reality. It is idle to argue whether or not there should be a country such as Israel.

2. The United States had a leading part in the establishment and recognition of Israel as a free and independent country. It cannot, and will not, stand idly by and see Israel destroyed.

3. Perhaps most important of all, despite the initial hardships and difficulties which this new little State has encountered and despite the efforts of the Communists to entice Israel into their orbit, Israel has stood firm for freedom in the great struggle of this mid-20th century.

To Israel we say: "We cherish your freedom and we intend to do what we can to keep you free."

It is imperative that we renew this assurance from time to time. We need to do so to make crystal clear to Russia and to others that we will live up to the moral obligation that we incurred when we helped to establish that little country.

By patience, tolerance, perseverance, and vigilance in the protection of individual freedom, Israel can serve to lead others to democracy and its many advantages.

It is encouraging that you are doing your bit in working for continued economic development and prosperity in that area.

Let me thank you again for this occasion and this opportunity to be with you. I wish you every success in your great work.

Excerpts From Speech by Senator Harry F. Byrd, of Virginia, at His 37th Annual Orchard Picnic, Berryville, Va., Saturday, August 29, 1959

OF
HON. WATKINS M. ABBITT
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 4, 1959

Mr. ABBITT. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, August 29, the Honorable HARRY F. BYRD, senior Senator from Virginia, gave his 37th annual orchard picnic at Berryville, Va. Senator BYRD is so widely known, respected, and beloved by the people that I will not go into his many accomplishments but simply state that he is Virginia's first citizen and one of the outstanding statesmen of America. At the picnic, as has been the custom in the past, Senator BYRD delivered a most enlightening and cogent speech on the events of interest to our people. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith Senator BYRD's speech:

One of the main topics of conversation in Washington is the approaching visit of Khrushchev. The Congress appears to be divided as to the wisdom of his visit. It has its minus side as well as its plus side. Should one of the hundreds of thousands of refugees who have come to America because of the cruelty of Communist Russia take a shot at Khrushchev, it might start a third world war. Such risks as this, in my opinion, outweigh the plus side of his visit.

I am one of those Senators who do not believe he should be invited to address a joint session of the Congress of the United States.

That is the supreme honor accorded only to those we can trust and those who are our friends, such as Winston Churchill. Should a resolution inviting him be presented, and I hope it will not be, I will consider it my duty to vote against it. I am not willing for the Congress officially to pay tribute to the world's greatest Communist and our most dangerous enemy by inviting him to speak formally to the Congress of the United States.

We all know that we must live in the same world with those who ideas differ from ours, and with nations which have different forms of government. But in the case of Russia, let us always remember that Russia is a totalitarian nation, controlled by one man who recognizes only brute strength.

Let us greet Mr. Khrushchev with courtesy, let us protect him in every way possible, but do not let him or any other Russian lead us into a sense of false security. And above all do not let him sell us a bill of goods.

We must keep our military strength equal to if not greater than Russia's. This is our only protection. The Russians equal or excel us in the field of rockets. They definitely excel us in submarines equipped with nuclear weapons, but we excel them in the air and on the sea and in the development of atomic weapons.

It is tragic that after World War II we should find it necessary to prepare ourselves against attack by a formidable nation whose leader appears to be bent on extending his frontiers and control over weaker nations wherever he can find them. As a member of the Armed Services Committee I tell you we must not let our guard down.

As has been my custom, I will give you a BYRD's eye view of the work of the Congress and elsewhere in the Government this year. I shall not go into detail because much has happened since our last meeting.

THE WARREN SUPREME COURT

I call the present Supreme Court the Warren court so as to distinguish it from those courts on which great Justices previously have served our country so honorably and well and with such distinction and dedication to our principles.

The Warren court continues to run true to form, continues to render decision after decision in defiance of constitutional democracy, which, in the brief space of about 180 years, has made America the greatest of all nations.

America has only one-sixth of the population of the world, one-seventh of the earth's surface, but produces one-third of all the world's goods. This is because of our competitive enterprise system and the freedoms of our people.

The Warren court hands down decisions on Mondays. Nearly every Monday when the Court is in session is a Black Monday.

I will not go over the ground which I covered here a year ago when I listed the decisions of the Warren court since 1954. Beginning with the integration decision, these Warren court decisions have steadily weakened our democracy.

This school decision is perhaps the most iniquitous and infamous of all. It was not based upon law nor was it based upon the Constitution, as many distinguished lawyers have so often said.

Since I spoke to you last, the Warren court has rendered three more particularly vicious decisions:

One to search a man's house without a warrant.

Even under the despotic rule of the early English kings a man's home was his castle, and no one could enter without due process of law.

Another decision would destroy the right of States to control and protect their citizens from indecency and immorality in books and pictures.

The third was a decision to permit the States to tax interstate commerce, which is in violation of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution.

It happens that I have two distinctions, although some may think they are not too creditable. One is that I am the only Member of the Senate now who voted against the Wagner Labor Act in 1935 which gave special privileges to the labor unions.

The second distinction is that I am the only Member of the Senate now who opposed the Tennessee Valley Authority.

These votes represent my philosophy of government. I do not believe in special privileges for either labor or business. I believe in the private enterprise system which is the source of our progress and advancement.

The Senate labor bill was a weak bill. I did all I could to strengthen it. The House labor bill is strong. It not only gives protection to the membership of the unions, but also controls secondary boycotts, hot cargoes, and such things which can destroy businesses not directly involved in any strike.

The House bill has strong provisions to prevent the intimidation of workers by means of picketing. Virginia is fortunate in that during the administration of Gov. William M. Tuck workers were guaranteed the right to work and are protected against violence and interference by pickets or otherwise.

The new Federal labor bill is now in conference where the differences between the House and the Senate bills are being worked out. Labor legislation must not be unfair to labor, but the excesses of ruthless labor leaders must be curbed. Only Congress has the power to do this.

James B. Carey, president of the International Union of Electrical Radio and Machine Workers, inadvertently gave an assist to the passage of the stronger House bill when he wrote to each Member of Congress threatening to defeat every Senator and Congressman who voted for the bill.

PRINCE EDWARD

Before I conclude let me mention that ordinarily public schools next week would be reopening all over the State. But this year not a public school in Prince Edward County will open. Never before in the history of public schools in Virginia or any other State has a whole county withdrawn from the public education system.

It is vital, I think, that we in Virginia and people everywhere in America understand the conditions that brought about this closing of all public schools in an entire county.

In 1951 a suit was instituted against Prince Edward County in Virginia and Clarendon County, S.C., to require school integration. In 1954 the Warren court rendered a decision directed at these two counties imposing integration in all public schools with deliberate speed.

The great and able Virginia judge, Sterling Hutcheson, in a memorable decision, found deliberate speed in the case of Prince Edward to be at least 6 to 7 years.

The leaders of the NAACP then took an appeal, although they were urged not to do so my many of those who favored the Warren Supreme Court decision. Then the Federal Court of Appeals overruled Judge Hutcheson and ordered the Prince Edward schools to be integrated in the school year beginning next week. Thus, the county of Prince Edward faced massive integration. Such an enforced integration means the destruction of the public schools in that county.

There are 1780 colored pupils in Prince Edward and 1562 white pupils. The people of Prince Edward were prepared. They had determined when the suit was first instituted against them 8 years ago that they would resist forced integration. They did this in order to preserve a system of education because they knew white students would not attend integrated schools.

It is significant that although Clarendon County, S.C., was the other defendant in the suit, no effort has been made by the NAACP to integrate in that county.

The people of Prince Edward made no threats, they issued no inflammatory statements. There was no violence and no disorder. They have calmly and deliberately established a new system of private education without the use of a single public-school facility, buildings, schoolbuses, or any other public-school equipment.

Every white student in the county will go to school, using completely nonpublic facilities. The parents of the colored students have not attempted to avail themselves of other means of education.

In order to comply with the decision of Chief Justice Taft, rendered in 1928, providing for equal but separate school facilities, Prince Edward expended $1 million on a colored high school building. Prince Edward still owes $400,000 on this school. It will be closed. The blame for this situation must be placed directly upon the ruthless action of the NAACP.

The colored people of Prince Edward County have been the victims of their leaders. Their lack of education must be laid directly at the door of those NAACP leaders who have become the integration enforcement agents for the Warren court.

Since the NAACP is responsible for closing the Negro schools in Prince Edward it would be appropriate for this association to allocate a part of its large tax exempt income to aid the Negroes in this county to obtain an education. In doing this the NAACP could in part make atonement for the injury they have done to these members of their race.

Knowing the people of Prince Edward as I do, I am confident that they are prepared to do everything wthin their power to give the colored students of Prince Edward the same education they have had in the past in segregated schools.

The NAACP has won its lawsuits and the Negroes have lost their schools, operated 85 percent at the expense of the white people of Prince Edward.

It is a tragedy for everyone—all because the NAACP deliberately and maliciously forced this action upon Prince Edward. Prince Edward has taken the only action it could take. The county had sought by every honorable means to avoid this step. It was faced with the destruction of its school system. White parents had taxed themselves heavily to build new Negro schools, and the Negroes had as many classrooms as the whites—Negro schoolteachers were paid exactly the same as the white.

The action that Prince Edward has taken is courageous, and it was thoughtfully and well considered. The brave citizens of Prince Edward are true to the faith of their fathers.

Those who expressed confidence in the so-called moderation of the NAACP which is enforcing the integration laws should not only take note of this ruthless action taken against Prince Edward, but they should note the recent statement by the NAACP spokesman, Roy Wilkins, which has great significance.

"With the collapse of massive resistance laws," declares Roy Wilkins, national executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, "the South is trying to adopt a token compliance policy to get around the 1954 Supreme Court decision. Generally," he adds, "we are opposed to any form of token integration on the grounds that it is contrary to the Court's decision, but the NAACP will go along with plans where it appears to be a bona fide start toward desegregation."

Note that Wilkins accepts token integration only as a "bona fide start toward desegregation." Desegregation means massive integration.

I and other Virginians who advocated massive resistance to the illegal school integration decision of the Warren court have been bitterly denounced, chiefly by those outside of Virginia.

I stand now as I stood when I first urged massive resistance.

I believe then as I believe now that it is either massive resistance or in the long run run massive integration, and this would destroy our entire school system.

As one who has been honored so often by the Virginia people I felt my duty was to give the best advice of which I was capable.

At least under the massive resistance program Virginia remained segregated for 5 years after the Warren decision, notwithstanding the fact that massive efforts of the Federal Government and the NAACP were directed at Virginia alone.

Due to the concentration of all power against us today Virginia is the only Southern State having enforced integration.

The policy was to break Virginia down first, and now the unholy alliance of the NAACP and the Federal Government will attempt the same strong-arm methods throughout the South.

I am firmly convinced that as long as the NAACP is in the driver's seat, the goal is massive integration all down the line in all walks of life.

Just a few weeks ago the NAACP met in New York City in annual convention and were addressed by so-called political notables.

A resolution was adopted declaring for complete integration of the races in all areas, effective on the 100th anniversary of the signing by Lincoln of the proclamation for the emancipation of the slaves. This program naturally includes declaring unconstitutional all State laws prohibiting mixed marriages.

If Warren lives long enough and remains on the Court this decision will certainly be rendered. It is not necessary for me to forecast the calamitous results of massive integration accompanied by legal encouragement toward mixed marriages.

SENATE

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1959

(Legislative day of Monday, August 31, 1959)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Father, strong to save: Amid all the confusion and bafflement of these days, we pray by Thy sustaining grace that our minds may be kept clear and clean and uncluttered by prejudice.

Lord, in this hour of tumult;
Lord, in this night of fears;
Keep open, O keep open
Our eyes, our hearts, our ears
In this sacred temple of the Republic's life,
Not blindly nor in hatred,
Lord let us do our part.
Keep open, O keep open, dear Lord,
Our eyes, our mind, our heart.

Amen.

REQUESTS FOR COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Banking and Currency Committee, which is considering the housing bill, be permitted to sit during the session of the Senate today.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection——

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, it may be necessary to recess the Senate, in order to permit committees to meet, to transact the public business. I hope that will not be necessary; but I want all Members to be on notice that it may be necessary. I trust that the 90-odd Members who indicated that they were willing, ready, and anxious to work to complete the job which we were elected to do will be here to support that position.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Finance Committee, which has under consideration the bill on the interest rate ceiling on E bonds and H bonds, may be permitted to sit during the session of the Senate today.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I object

FEDERAL-AID HIGHWAY ACT OF 1959

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 934, House bill 8678.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 8678) to amend the Federal-Aid Highway Acts of 1956 and 1958 to make certain adjustments in the Federal-aid highway program, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 8678) to amend the Federal-Aid Highway Acts of 1956 and 1958 to make certain adjustments in the Federal-aid highway program, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Works, with amendments; and subsequently had been reported from the Committee on Finance, with additional amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the motion to consider the bill was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I give notice to the Senate that we expect to have a late session this evening. It may continue until as late as midnight, at least. We are hopeful that the Senate will be able today to pass the very important Federal-aid-to-highways bill.

We received complete cooperation from all the members of the two Senate committees yesterday; and I particularly wish to express the appreciation of the Senate and, I believe, of the country, to the very able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], the very able Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], and the very able Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], and to other Senators who had proposals in which they were interested. They realize the importance of this bill; and they also realize that with each day that passes, the country is losing taxes it will need in order to make the highway program a success.

As a result of their diligence and the diligence of the chairman of the Finance Committee, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and the chairman of the Public Works Committee, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], we were able—notwithstanding the fact that it was necessary for the Senate to be in recess—to get that important piece of proposed legislation reported.

Each Member will have a chance to say what he wishes to say on that measure, today; and a little later I will propose a unanimous-consent request for a limitation of time, so that Members who may desire to be away from the Chamber may know when to expect votes.

But at the moment——

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. PROUTY. The Senator from Texas knows that a very controversial amendment, an amendment which relates to billboards, which was approved yesterday by the Public Works Committee, is in the highway bill; and millions of people throughout the country are very much concerned about that provision.

I hope the distinguished majority leader will not seek to limit time on this important question, about which few Members know anything; they have no idea of what the effects will be on their individual States. I believe widespread resentment would result if we were to act on this proposal too precipitately.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I do not intend to act on it precipitately. I am simply trying to carry out the requests of the administration and of the Members of the Senate.

So we shall be here hour after hour after hour, to attend to the necessary business.

Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas.

RECESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock and 5 minutes a.m.) the Senate took a recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

At 12 o'clock and 45 minutes p.m. the Senate resumed its session, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill coming over from the House of Representatives, which will be read the first time.

The bill (H.R. 9035) to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the second reading and reference of the bill?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in adjournment for 3 minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and, at 12 o'clock and 48 minutes p.m., the Senate adjourned for 3 minutes.

AFTER ADJOURNMENT

(Saturday, September 5, 1959)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock and 51 minutes p.m., pursuant to adjournment.

DESIGNATION OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., September 5, 1959.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. ALAN BIBLE, a Senator from the State of Nevada, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

CARL HAYDEN,
President pro tempore.

Mr. BIBLE thereupon took the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Master of all good workmen, enrich us with the durable satisfactions of life, so that the multiplying years may not find us bankrupt in those things which matter most—the golden currency of faith, and hope, and love.

We ask it in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed to read the Journal.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of Thursday, September 3, Friday, September 4, and Saturday, September 5, embraced in the legislative day of Monday, August 31, 1959.

During the reading the following occurred:

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is it proper to have the bill read the second time now?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be proper to do so as soon as the reading of the Journal has been disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That will take several minutes, if it is desired to waste the public funds to engage in dilatory tactics by reading the Journal. But if it is necessary to do so, that can be done. Then we hope to have the bill read the second time and referred to committee. It is a very important bill. It is a bill on which we want to act next week. The committee is prepared to meet late this afternoon. If the Journal can be approved without having it read in its entirety, I should like to have that done, because the reading of the Journal is purely a formality.

I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with, so that the bill may be read the second time and referred to committee, and that the committee can give proper consideration to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. Reserving the right to object, I shall not take any time now to discuss certain reasons for the course of action which the senior Senator from Oregon is taking in regard to the parliamentary problems before the Senate. I shall discuss them at some length in a later speech. Therefore, at this time I will object.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will proceed with the reading of the Journal.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the Journal.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, may we have order, so that I can hear the reading of the Journal? I raise a parliamentary inquiry.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order. The Senator may state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MORSE. Will the Chair advise me whether the Journal is being read in sequence, without omissions? The only reason why I raise the question is that I notice the reading clerk has turned a great many pages. I assume they are blank pages and are not a part of the Journal.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that the Secretary read the action on the conference report, but did not read the conference report word for word.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I object to the omission from the reading of any of the material contained in the Journal. The rule makes perfectly clear that the Journal is to be read and that the Journal is subject to approval; and I object to any omission or failure to read any part of the official Journal.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that objection has been made; therefore, the Journal is to be read in full.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the Journal.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I cannot hear the Secretary.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must insist that the Senate be in order. The Secretary will suspend until the Senate is in order.

The Chair asks the Secretary to read just a little louder, so the Senator from Oregon can hear every word.

The Secretary will proceed.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore announced that he had signed the following enrolled bills, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

S. 2457. An act to provide equitable treatment for producers participating in the soil bank program on the basis of incorrect information furnished by the Government;

H.R. 7040. An act making appropriations for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, corporations, agencies, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for other purposes; and

INTEREST RATES ON E AND H U.S. SAVINGS BONDS—HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate House bill 9035 for a second reading and reference to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H.R. 9035) to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes, which was read the second time by title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

FEDERAL AID HIGHWAY ACT OF 1959

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 934, House bill 8678, the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 8678), to amend the Federal-Aid Highway Acts of 1956 and 1958 to make certain adjustments in the Federal-aid highway program, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Works with amendments, and subsequently reported from the Committee on Finance with additional amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to inform Senators that this is a very important bill. There are a number of amendments both from the Committee on Public Works and the Committee on Finance which Senators will wish to examine. Several amendments have been submitted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], and other members of the Finance Committee. I am told that so far as the committee is concerned, no lengthy debate will be necessary, although a full explanation is desired of each amendment and of its effect. Rollcalls will be requested.

One of the amendments involves reducing the appropriations 1 percent. Another amendment involves using the tax dividend credit, to take care of highway obligations. There are other amendments with which I am not familiar in detail.

The Senate will remain in session as late this evening as necessary to pass the bill and send it to conference. Some amendments have been added by both the Public Works Committee and the Finance Committee. It is desired to send the bill to conference before the Senate adjourns or takes a recess this evening. So I ask the acting minority leader and the attachés on the minority side, as well as those on the majority side, to give each Senator due notice that there is pending business.

It may be necessary for the Senate to take a recess for a brief period for consideration of other committee business if we are unable to obtain consent to have committees meet during the session of the Senate. I am hopeful that we shall be able to obtain consent for the Finance Committee to meet for a brief period. If so, we shall not have to take a recess. However, if a recess is necessary, it will be taken, and the Senate will reassemble later.

I also expect to ask unanimous consent, if I am able to arrive at a satisfactory arrangement with the author of an amendment and with the chairman of the committee and any other Senators who may be interested in specific amendments, so that Senators who may be detained at other places in the city or at their homes will know definitely the time we expect to vote, in order that all Senators may have an opportunity to record themselves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the first committee amendment.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MORSE. I intended to propound this inquiry immediately following the reading of the Journal. For the RECORD, I should like to make this inquiry: Will the Chair advise the Senator from Oregon whether or not the entire Journal was read, without omissions?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So far as the Chair knows, the entire Journal was read, without omission.

The clerk will state the first committee amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, after line 15, it is proposed a new section, entitled "Parkways."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] if he is prepared to offer his amendment when he obtains recognition?

Mr. GORE. I am.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I hope all Senators now in the Chamber will take note of this fact, and that the aides will notify other Senators.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be agreed to en bloc, and that the bill, as thus amended, be regarded as original text for the purpose of amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendments of the Committee on Public Works agreed to en bloc were:

On page 2, after line 15, to insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 104. Parkways.

"For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 4(b) of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1958 (72 Stat. 93), there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the construction, reconstruction, and improvement of parkways, authorized by Acts of Congress, on lands to which title is vested in the United States, the additional sum of $2,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960."

At the top of page 3, to insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 105. National System of Interstate and Defense Highway mileage study for Alaska and Hawaii.

"The Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to make a study of the need for the extension of the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways within the States of Alaska and Hawaii, and report the results of such study to the Congress within ten days subsequent to January 4, 1960. The report shall include recommendations as to the approximate routes and mileages thereof which should be included in such system within those States."

After line 11, to insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 106. Exemption from national standards of certain areas adjacent to the Interstate System.

"That subsection (b) of title 23, section 131 of the United States Code is amended by striking therefrom the following language: 'Upon application of the State, any such agreement may, within the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce consistent with the national policy, provide for excluding from application of the national standards segments of the Interstate System which traverse incorporated municipalities wherein the use of real property adjacent to the Interstate System is subject to municipal regulation or control, or which traverse other areas where the land use is clearly established by State law as industrial or commercial:' and substituting therefor the following language: 'This section shall not apply to those segments of the Interstate System within the presently existing boundaries of incorporated municipalities where in the use of real property adjacent to the Interstate System is subject to municipal regulation or control, or which traverse other areas where the land use, as of the date of approval of this Act, is clearly established by State law as industrial or commercial:'"

And on page 4, after line 10, to insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 107. Emergency relief.

"(a) That section 125 of title 23, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"'§ 125. Emergency relief.

"'(a) An emergency fund is authorized for expenditure by the Secretary, subject to the provisions of this section and section 120, for the repair or reconstruction of highways, roads, and trails which he shall find have suffered serious damage as the result of disaster over a wide area, such as by floods, hurricanes, tidal waves, earthquakes, severe storms, landslides, or other catastrophes in any part of the United States. The appropriation of such moneys, not to exceed $30,000,000 as may be necessary for the initial establishment of this fund and for its replenishment on an annual basis is authorized. Pending such appropriation or replenishment the Secretary may expend from any funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated for expenditure in accordance with the provisions of this title, including existing Federal-aid appropriations, such sums as may be necessary for the immediate prosecution of the work herein authorized, such appropriations to be reimbursed from the appropriations herein authorized when made.

"'(b) The Secretary may expend funds from the emergency fund herein authorized for the repair or reconstruction of highways on the Federal-aid highway systems, including the Interstate System, in accordance with the provisions of this chapter. Except as to highways, roads, and trails mentioned in subsection (c) of this section, no funds shall be so expended unless the Secretary has received an application therefor from the State highway department, and unless an emergency has been declared by the Governor of the State and concurred in by the Secretary.

"'(c) The Secretary may expend funds from the emergency fund herein authorized, either independently or in cooperation with any other branch of the Government, State agency, organization, or person, for the repair or reconstruction of forest highways, forest development roads and trails, park roads and trails, and Indian reservation roads, whether or not such highways, roads, or trails are on any of the Federal-aid highway systems.'

"(b) Subsection (f) of section 120 of title 23, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"'(f) The Federal share payable on account of any repair or reconstruction provided for by funds made available under section 125 of this title shall not exceed 50 per centum of the cost thereof, except that the Federal share payable on account of any repair or reconstruction of forest highways, forest development roads and trails, park roads and trails, and Indian reservation roads may amount to 100 per centum of the cost thereof, whether or not such highways, roads, or trails are on any Federal-aid highway system. Any project agreement for which the final voucher has not been approved by the Secretary on or before the date of this Act may be modified to provide for the Federal share authorized herein.'"

The amendments of the Committee on Finance agreed to en bloc were:

On page 7, at the beginning of line 2, to strike out "September" and insert "October"; at the beginning of line 10, to strike out "September" and insert "October"; on page 8, line 5, after the word "on", to strike out "September" and insert "October"; in line 16, after the word "after", to strike out "November 30" and insert "December 31"; on page 9, line 5, after "July 1,", to strike out "1951" and insert "1961"; on page 11, line 19, after the word "distributor", to insert "and a dealer selling gasoline exclusively to producers of gasoline", and on page 12, line 7, after "(2)", to strike out "is registered and bonded" and insert "elects to register and give a bond."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee will offer his amendment at the conclusion of these statements by Senators who now desire recognition, I shall attempt to obtain the attendance of other Senators.

THE CRISIS IN LAOS

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, the latest phase of overt Communist aggression against free and peaceful neighbors, the subjugation of Tibet and the guerrilla-type invasions of Laos and India, marks the end of the uneasy truce that has existed in southeast Asia since the Geneva accord of 1954. The conjunction of this aggression with the preparation of an exchange of informal summit meetings between Khrushchev and President Eisenhower calls to mind two events of recent history.

One is the trip of Bulganin and Khrushchev to India in 1955. Prime Minister Nehru, in an honest but misguided attempt to give Khrushchev and Bulganin full opportunity to observe and to be observed, gave them every chance to make the most of their visit. Every kindness and honor imaginable was extended to them. Khrushchev and Bulganin were invited to address the Indian Parliament, just as many have urged that Khrushchev be invited to address our Congress. The theme of their talks was peaceful coexistence, just as Khrushchev has recently released an address on peaceful coexistence for publication in American newspapers.

Khrushchev and Bulganin donned Indian headdress, publicly observed the rituals and customs of the Moslems, and in general took full advantage of every opportunity to make a favorable impression and to create a false atmosphere of good feeling.

And what was the result of all this?

The people of India were softened up. The hand of communism within India was strengthened. The Government of India was lulled into a false sense of security. And now, those who preached peaceful coexistence a few years ago have launched Communist invasions into Indian territory and are directing Communist uprisings and riotings in the cities of India.

The second event which the present world situation calls to mind is the ill-fated Geneva Summit Conference also in 1955. That conference, like those of this year, was called ostensibly to achieve a "lessening of tensions."

The same make-believe atmosphere of false optimism that is now so apparent filled the air then.

We now know that at the very time free world leaders were meeting with Khrushchev and Bulganin to discuss peace, the Communists were secretly shipping arms to the Middle East in an attempt to stir up further warfare and subversion.

And so it is not surprising that preparations for a new round of summit conferences should be accompanied by new acts of Communist aggression, this time in southeast Asia.

But there is one striking difference in the circumstances surrounding the summit conference of 1955 and the present series of negotiations.

Khrushchev made some peaceful gestures to pave the way for the last summit conference, by agreeing to the liberation of Austria and by the dramatic though short-lived restoration of normal relations with Yugoslavia. And at that time, the treacherous arms shipments to the Middle East were made under a veil of secrecy.

Here lies the great difference between then and now. The present Communist estimate of the free world and its leaders is so diminished that they now seek, and gain, their conferences by ultimatums. And the Communists are now so contemptuous of us that they engage in open aggression as a prelude to meetings with our President.

The guerrilla attacks on India and Laos constitute only a part of an entire pattern of Communist aggression extending along the 2,000-mile border of Communist China which parallels the borders of Laos, Burma, India, Bhutan, Sikkim, and Nepal. Each of these nations is being attacked, infiltrated or threatened by forces directed from Peiping and Moscow. From the China Sea to the Himalayas, militant and aggressive communism is on the march.

There is a great deal of speculation about the nature of Khrushchev's role in these attacks. I believe that Khrushchev is an accomplice and a collaborator. During the early stages of the attack on Laos, the North Vietnamese Communist chief, Ho Chi Minh, was Khrushchev's guest during an extended state visit to Moscow. Ho was in Moscow throughout the period when the propaganda barrage against Laos was unleased. First, the Red government in Hanoi, then the Red government in Peiping, and finally the Red government in Moscow joined in the propaganda attack which accompanied the invasion.

The Moscow press continues to make its false charges against Laos and the United States.

There was a time, only a few months ago, when the President refused to negotiate under the threat of an ultimatum. Now, we not only negotiate under ultimatum, but in the face of open aggression against the free world.

The subjugation of Tibet is now an accomplished fact. Its remoteness and inaccessibility foreclosed its defense.

As for India, Prime Minister Nehru declines to call the attack across Indian borders an invasion. He does not seek free world assistance and we must await further action by the Government of India before planning our own course.

But in Laos the situation is different. It is a nation which can be defended. It is a nation which has asked for free world help. It is a nation whose defense is essential, geographically and psychologically, if we are to save southeast Asia from communism.

The fall of Laos would give the Communists easy access to Cambodia and Thailand across a vulnerable frontier, and it would allow them to flank South Vietnam. Should Laos fall, should the story of North Vietnam be repeated, it is probable that the free peoples of southeast Asia would become so demoralized as to make their lands impossible to defend.

And so I should like briefly to review the situation there and suggest a course of action for our country.

Laos is a small nation with about two million inhabitants. Its borders were created by the Geneva truce of 1954 by which French Indochina was divided between the Communists and the free world. The Communist half bears the name North Vietnam. The free half was in turn subdivided into the states of Laos, South Vietnam and Cambodia.

The United States did not sign the Geneva accord which divided French Indochina, presumably because of Secretary Dulles' conviction that this agreement represented appeasement to communism.

Having neither the courage for armed intervention against the Communists in Indochina nor the honesty to openly acquiesce in appeasement, our Government, like Pontius Pilate, washed its hands of the matter. But we have not been able to wash our hands of the consequences of this appeasement.

It is somewhat remarkable that the free section of Indochina has resisted Communist subversion for 5 years. At the time of the Geneva accord in 1954, all signs pointed to a swift Communist takeover of the entire Indochina area. A combination of factors, including effective local leadership and large scale free world assistance has preserved this area from falling victim to Communist subversion or infiltration. It is now clear that it will fall only through overt military aggression and that is what is taking place at this moment.

Since 1955, the United States has poured $225 million of economic aid into Laos, an enormous amount for a nation of this size.

There are conflicting estimates of the effectiveness of our Lao foreign aid program. Some grave charges have been made against its operation, and strong rebuttals have been made to those charges. Whatever the imperfections of the program, it is clear that our aid has strengthened the country and improved conditions of life there.

The leader of Laos, Prime Minister Phoui Sananikone, has apparently proved to be a forceful, capable, and popular figure. Faced in the beginning with two provinces under the control of a Communist group known as the Pathet Lao, and saddled with Communist representatives in his Cabinet, he has integrated Pathet Lao into free Laos and has banished Communist representation from his government.

Laos now has an army of about 25,000 regular troops, backed up by 16,000 militia. This army is largely untrained, and a training program, directed by the French, is now under way. The army is financed and equipped through U.S. aid.

Communist guerrilla invaders are now active in 8 of the 12 provinces of Laos. They are present in large numbers only in the Province of Sam Neua, where two Communist pincer movements have this province virtually surrounded.

It is estimated by Lao observers that approximately 2,500 Communist guerrillas are in Sam Neua Province, broken up into small groups of 50 to 200 men. An additional 1,000 Communist guerrillas are scattered throughout the other seven provinces.

As yet there have been no pitched battles nor large-scale fighting. But the mountainous, junglelike, inaccessible terrain of Laos adapts itself perfectly to Communist guerrilla tactics.

Guerrilla forces have struck within 16 miles of Vientiene, the administrative capital of Laos. Today's reports place them a dozen miles from the principal government position in Sam Neua. Characteristic of this type of warfare is the report of one of these guerrilla units called a "psychological warfare unit" containing approximately 130 men. This unit is terrorizing Lao communities by raiding villages, and by slashing the throats of infants in the presence of their parents and hurling their multilated bodies into the Mekong River in order to send a message of terror to the communities to the south. This is the authentic mark of communism.

The situation is further complicated by the fact that this is the monsoon season. This makes it difficult for the Government of Laos to maintain supply lines and communications with its troops, and we may assume that it similarly hampers the invading Communist forces. The monsoon season ends in November. The present limited invasion is achieving four Communist military objectives preparatory to a possible full-scale invasion in November.

First, by forcing the Lao Army to enter the field in full strength, it is badly interfering with the vitally needed training program which the French and the United States are trying to carry out.

Second, it has broken up government military operations in the outlying areas thus enabling Communists to infiltrate the population of these provinces.

Third, it has forced the deployment of the Lao Army in scattered positions throughout Laos.

Fourth, it is softening up the people of Laos through terror and demoralization in a land which cannot be defended without determined and courageous popular support.

And so all the elements of disaster are present in Laos today. The full proportions of the danger will not be known until November.

The response of our Government thus far leaves much to be desired. Laos apprised us of the danger early this summer and asked for increased militay assistance prior to the first Communist attacks. It repeated its request after the fighting began.

Last week it again requested aid. This time our Government belatedly responded by reportedly granting aid which will provide for between 5,000 and 8,000 additional troops for the Lao Army. It has been announced that an immediate airlift operation is being put into effect by the Navy to get this aid to the Lao Army.

This is encouraging. But our official statements on the Lao question have been so lethargic, legalistic, and halfhearted as to give encouragement to the Communist aggressors. Instead of making it clear that we will provide Laos with whatever assistance necessary to defend its borders, we have been publicly minimizing our participation and apparently acquiescing in a limitation upon the type and amount of assistance. For weeks the State Department has been repeating that the United States has no bases in Laos in an apparent attempt to mollify the Communists. We have seemed overanxious to prove that the United States has only a small number of technicians and accountants in Laos. We have emphasized that our aid was only of the small arms variety and have indicated that our aid would be limited in amounts and in kind.

Our officials are quoted as saying that no thought was being given to action by the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization.

Also we have put out a lot of nonsense about not doing anything to violate the "spirit of the Geneva accords"; accords which have already been torn up by the Communists; accords which would limit the military strength of Laos to an inadequate force armed with obsolete weapons; accords which the United States was never signatory to in the first place.

At a time when Laos is fighting for its life, at a time when the confidence of its people in free world help may make the difference between victory and defeat, the United States contents itself with announcing not what it is doing, but what it is not doing.

Since we do not now know the degree to which the guerrilla invasion will be backed by North Vietnam, Communist China, and Russia, we cannot know whether the invasion of Laos can be thrown back by Lao forces alone, or whether the armed intervention of the United States and perhaps other free world nations will be required to defend that country.

In the last few days we have had newspaper reports that outside Communist help to the guerrilla invaders was being dramatically stepped up. We received this information not from our Government, with appropriate warnings of the gravity of the situation, but through the efforts of courageous and dedicated newspapermen.

One of these, Joseph Alsop, after warning our people day after day of the dangerous situation there, has risked his life by flying to the fighting front in the jungles of Laos in order that a sleeping nation could have firsthand reports.

The details of our action must vary with shifting conditions, but the implacability of our resistance, the firm resolve to do whatever becomes necessary to drive back the Communist invaders, must be clearly known from the outset, and it must be constant and not subject to change.

Whatever the Communist motive and plan of attack, we know one thing which will always be right and which will always furnish a guide for action. We cannot yield another foot of territory to communism anywhere in the world.

For once, I hope that we will not wait upon the Communist initiative month after month and tailor our actions by what they do.

President Eisenhower said only a week ago that we will oppose any aggression "if necessary by force." I think it is necessary for the President to repeat this pledge with specific reference to Laos, and I urge members of his administration and Members of Congress continually to restate this principle, and to take whatever steps may be necessary to live up to it.

Let me repeat: I recommend that we announce to the world that, whether through the United Nations or through SEATO or through unilateral action, we will do whatever becomes necessary to defend Laos, including armed intervention.

I ask for an official, irrevocable statement that it is a national policy of this country to defend Laos whatever this defense entails.

I ask for a speedup in deliveries of arms and equipment to the Lao Army and for an announcement that our aid will not be limited by any Geneva accords and will be governed only by the needs of the Lao Army.

I ask that the Senate restore the unwise cuts which were made in the military assistance program.

I ask that our Government do everything it can to bring about a special session of the United Nations Security Council which in turn could summon a special emergency session of the United Nations General Assembly.

If the U.N. Secretary General is now powerless to act, as he says he is, we must swiftly take the necessary steps to give him a mandate to act.

If the United Nations proves unable to act effectively against Red aggression, at least it can bring the moral condemnation of the free world to bear upon the Communists at the very time their leader is attempting to soften up the free world with protestations of peace and with propaganda tours through non-Communist nations.

I urge the President reconsider his plan for an exchange of visits with Khrushchev. At the very least, the President should lay before Khrushchev the alternatives of either calling off the Communist aggression in Asia or canceling the proposed conferences. If Khrushchev should reply that the events in Asia are beyond his control, then we should make him prove it by agreeing not to use the Soviet veto to block action by the United Nations Security Council.

Each day brings further evidence that Khrushchev has no intention of seeking peace and that he regards peace conferences and State visits abroad only as additional means of waging war against free nations.

If we indicate now, unmistakably and irrevocably, that there is no limit to the action we are prepared to take to drive the Communist invaders out of Laos, past experience leads us to believe the Communists may withdraw from their aggressive designs.

If they do not withdraw, it will only indicate that years of neglect of our military strength in the face of the Communist military buildup, years of vacillation in the face of Communist firmness, years of inaction in the face of aggressive and determined Communist action, have at last brought us to the point where our words are no longer respected and where we must now meet the Communist challenge with our deeds and with our blood.

Once again it has fallen to the people of a small, weak, and impoverished nation to wage the battle against communism for freemen everywhere. Once again a people already destitute, already the victims of tragedy and injustice, are having added to their bitter lot the terror of Communist aggression.

It seems that it is always the poorest and the most unfortunate who must bear the main burden of our common struggle against communism.

Today in Laos, men and women are being given rifles to defend their homes, by themselves, from a vicious invader.

We must see to it that they are not permanently abandoned to fight the battle alone.

The future of southeast Asia and perhaps of the entire free world hinges on the courage and the vigor of our response to the latest event in the constant Communist design to subjugate the free world.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR MANSFIELD

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, yesterday, the able and respected Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] made another notable address on foreign relations.

I commend the Senator from Montana, not only for the speech that he made yesterday, but also for the selfless, fearless and effective efforts he has been making for a very long time to bring about widespread discussion on vital aspects of foreign policy and to lay before the Nation imaginative proposals in the quest of peace.

Those who do not know the Senator from Montana except through his published speeches must have a deep respect for his eloquence, his scholarship, his courage, and his dedication to peace.

Those who are privileged to know him can add to this regard a deep personal respect and affection for one whose tolerance, magnanimity and selfless devotion to the public good shine through all his actions.

I associate myself with much of what the distinguished Senator from Montana had to say yesterday and commend him for a very great address.

THE HOUSING ACT OF 1959

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Tennessee is temporarily detained but will be here momentarily. He is very desirous that all Senators who can possibly be present be here while the amendment is being considered. I ask the aids of the minority and majority parties to please telephone Senators that a very important amendment is being considered.

The Senator from Tennessee has informed me that he expects a number of questions to be asked, and that his presentation will be as brief as possible, perhaps 25 or 30 minutes.

Mr. President, I hope we may have order in the Chamber, so that all Senators may hear the discussion, because we expect to have a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment. While there is a good attendance of Senators now, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, as called up by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Tennessee, so he may proceed with the statement he desired to make.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee will state it.

Mr. GORE. Is the amendment now before the Senate the one identified by the letter "D"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is identified by the letter "C".

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I withdraw that amendment, and call up my amendment "D", and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Inasmuch as the yeas and nays have been ordered on the question of agreeing to the amendment "C", the Senator from Tennessee will have to obtain unanimous consent before he can have the amendment withdrawn.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, isasmuch as, by error, the wrong amendment was called up, I ask unanimous consent that I may withdraw that amendment at this time, and may call up my amendment D.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—although of course I shall not object—I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair, if the Senator from Tennessee will be so kind as to permit me to do so: Has any time limitation in regard to consideration of the amendment or the bill been entered into?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? Without objection, it is so ordered; and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent that the names of Senators LONG of Louisiana, MCCARTHY, and MONRONEY may be added as additional cosponsors of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. President, I now call up my amendment identified as "D."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

(10) Section 6014(a) of such Code is amended by striking out "34 or".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsection (b) shall apply only with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1958.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on the question of agreeing to this amendment, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, my discussion of the highway program and the amendment which I have offered—and I offer it on behalf of myself and the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY]—will be brief.

To begin with, there is no disagreement between the members of either the Finance Committee or the Public Works Committee in regard to continuation of the highway program. It is agreed that the highway program must be continued.

I desire to point out that the difference or the issue presented by this amendment is divisible into two parts: first, the source from which, and the manner by which, additional revenue will be raised; and, second, the dedication to the highway trust fund of an amount sufficient to prevent a default in the fund within the present fiscal year.

Mr. President, there is a third question with which the Senate will need to deal, and it relates to apportionments for future years.

The amendment I have proposed is offered as a substitute for title II. It provides two things:

First, the amendment substitutes a repeal of the credit on dividends for a levy—as provided in the House version of the bill—of an additional 1 cent a gallon on every gallon of gasoline bought by every man, woman, and child in the United States. It also provides that four percentage points of the excise tax on automobiles shall be dedicated to the highway trust fund in fiscal 1960 and dedication of six percentage points of that tax for fiscal 1961, 1962, 1963, and 1964.

According to estimates made by the Treasury Department, the repeal of the dividend credit will yield to the general fund of the Treasury revenue in the amount of $335 million per year. The revenue from the additional 1-cent tax on gasoline, to begin October 1—as provided in the bill now before the Senate—would yield, according to estimates, $333 million this fiscal year.

So the yield to the Treasury—the additional revenue resulting from the bill before the committee or that resulting from the amendment I have submitted, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY]—will be approximately the same; the difference between the two will, according to the estimates, be only $2 million.

So the Senate has a choice between providing for $335 million of revenue, through repeal of the tax favoritism given to income received from dividends, on the one hand; or the levying of an additional 1 cent a gallon Federal sales tax on each gallon of gasoline, on the other hand.

I think that Members of the Senate question the equitableness of the proposed levy. Gasoline is a necessity and an essential commodity. Nearly every person in America—or, at least, an overwhelming proportion of the people in America—find it necessary to use gasoline. A sales tax on gasoline bears equally upon those who are able to pay and those who are not able to pay; it is no respecter whatever of ability to pay.

If this were the only tax upon this essential commodity, perhaps we could overlook it. But, Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that gasoline already bears a heavier tax than does any other essential commodity. For instance, in my State, the combination of State taxes and Federal taxes on gasoline approximates the refinery cost of gasoline. Where is there another essential commodity on which a 100 percent tax is already levied? Indeed, one must search far and near to find even a luxury commodity which bears the heavy burden of taxation that gasoline bears. I can think of only two which may be so heavily taxed; they are liquor and tobacco.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me at this time?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think it important, during this debate, to indicate that the American people are not so much interested in the purchase of small automobiles because of the fact that they are small as they are interested in purchasing such cars—and today they are purchasing them by the tens of thousands—of foreign manufacture, and, more recently, of American manufacture, because of the decreased consumption of gasoline in small automobiles. Tires on a replacement basis bring an additional saving.

I repeat that it is not because Americans are so much interested in smaller automobiles versus larger automobiles; the car size interests them not so much as does the amount of gasoline the automobile engines they purchase consume. Motorists are finding that the average annual use, for business and recreational purposes, of the small type of automobiles I have mentioned actually saves—because of the decreased fuel consumption—each motorist using such an automobile approximately $200 annually.

The presentation of this subject by the well informed Senator from Tennessee, is of utmost importance.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the contribution the Senator from West Virginia has made. He has stated a point of view which had not occurred to me.

Another point of view which has not been brought to the attention of the Senate, insofar as I am aware, is that only about one-seventh of the Nation's traffic is expected to use the System of Interstate and Defense Highways; yet every person who purchases gasoline—whether he uses the interstate highways or not—and in that connection I refer to the people in Alaska and the people in Hawaii—will be required to pay this additional tax. It is a very inequitable levy—inequitable not only for those reasons, but also because the tax on gasoline is already very heavy and quite burdensome.

It is inequitable for yet another reason: The users of our highways are already paying this year more than $1,600 million in excess of the amount devoted to highway improvement and construction. One billion six hundred million dollars is being diverted to purposes other than highway construction.

I do not accept the theory which some persons advocate that highway users should pay the entire cost of highways. I think highways benefit the entire Nation. Indeed President Eisenhower and General Clay presented this program as necessary in the interest of national defense.

There are many segments of our economy which benefit from highways that do not pay highway user excise taxes. Let us take the situation of Miami, Fla., for example. I notice the distinguished senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] is doing me the honor of listening to my remarks. The resort at Miami, with hundreds of beautiful hotels, depends in large part for its patronage upon people who use the highways traveling to and from the great and beautiful resort.

What about the automobile tire manufacturers, such as Goodyear and Firestone? Are not they beneficiaries of improved highways? What about General Motors, Ford, Chrysler? Indeed, one man out of seven who works in America today, we are told, earns his living in some way from the highway transportation industry.

Why, then, must the entire cost of highways be borne by the direct users of the highways? I do not accept this thesis. But, Mr. President, if we accept it, the highway users are already paying more—far more—than the cost of highways. As I have said, $1,600 million is being diverted this year from highway uses to other purposes.

How much money do we need this year? We need an estimated $493 million, according to the testimony before the committee, to meet the deficit in the highway trust fund. I am sure there will be no disagreement on that point. When do we need it? Immediately. The highway trust fund will be completely out of money on about October 1, we are told.

That is why I moved, earlier in this session, to replenish the funds in the highway trust fund. That is why we must move quickly now to do so.

Does the bill before the Senate wipe out the deficit in the highway trust fund? It does not. How much does it provide? $333 million. And what is the deficit? $493 million.

So, by the testimony given to the committee yesterday—and Senators will find it on their desks—even with the passage of House bill 8678, the highway trust fund would be in default $160 million this fiscal year. Because of the seasonal peaks of construction, the deficit will be $353 million December 31, this year, with the enactment of H.R. 8678.

So I submit that enactment of H.R. 8678 is not adequate. It will not solve the fiscal problem immediately at hand—the problem of meeting obligations already due. This will mean that the Federal Government will be in default to the States.

What does that mean to them? It means that the States will be in default upon the payment of contracts that have been performed and on which payment is due, unless, of course, the States can have special sessions of their legislatures to provide for the sale of bonds or raise funds in another manner.

Mr. President, this is a serious matter. This is a commitment. This highway program has been in operation since 1916. It has been on a matching basis, on a cooperative basis.

The Congress each 2 years has passed a bill providing for apportionments to the respective States for highway construction, in accordance with a formula determined by law. Each State knows exactly the amount to which it is entitled. Its legislature has without doubt proceeded upon this commitment. But now we are told that these commitments cannot be honored, even with the enactment of H.R. 8678. I would that all Members of the Senate could be made aware of this fact.

How does Mr. Tallamy propose to operate the Bureau of Public Roads without honoring the apportionments made by law? He told us yesterday he would do so by contract control. I hope that Senators will read the hearings of yesterday before they vote. I hope each Senator will read the testimony, because he told us that the Federal Government would exercise control of contracts within the respective States, even though the States provide 50 percent of the cost of projects on a matching basis.

The deficit to which I refer as existing this year will be for the reimbursement to the States for contracts already entered into on which no Federal control was exercised. These contracts were made pursuant to a law enacted by Congress and signed by the President. It is that deficit to which I refer when I refer to the deficit within the present fiscal year, which deficit will still be $160 million after H.R. 8678 becomes law, if it does.

Therefore, I propose to dedicate to the highway trust fund a sufficient amount in the present fiscal year to meet the deficit in the fund in order that the Federal Government can honor the commitments which have been made solely by an enactment of law by the Congress and the President of the United States.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I wish to compliment the distinguished Senator from Tennessee. He is making a very clear statement. I think I understand the Senator's amendment.

I am wondering, in view of what the Senator has shown us, whether it would be advisable not only to keep the 1 cent increase but also to repeal the credit against the income tax on stocks. That would give us the funds which are necessary, and give an overage, and I am sure the Treasury needs all taxes it can get.

I make this suggestion because these days, when there is a big national income, now close to $400 billion, we have to reach out and get those who can afford to pay to pay.

I simply make that suggestion. I am not a member of the committee, nor have I studied the problem before. The thought occurred to me as I heard the very fine, lucid statement of the distinguished Senator.

Mr. GORE. The Senator has made a very worth while suggestion. It is not at all without merit. Were it not for the inequitableness and unfairness of levying additional taxes on gasoline, which already bears such a heavy burden, I would readily accept his suggestion. Why? Because with the passage of H.R. 8678 we shall not only fail to meet the problem this fiscal year, but the problem we have this fiscal year is comparatively mild compared to what we shall face in the next fiscal year. I remind the Senate that at the beginning of the present fiscal year the highway trust fund had a surplus of about $500 million, whereas by the terms of H.R. 8678 we shall begin the next fiscal year with a deficit a $160 million. So we shall be $600 million worse off 1 year from now than we are now. There is no question that additional revenue is needed.

I do not offer my amendment as a solution to all the problems of the highway program. I offer it to accomplish two purposes: First, to dedicate a sufficient amount of the excise tax on automobiles to the highway trust fund to meet the deficit in the fund this year, secondly, to provide new revenues to the Treasury in an approximate amount which would result from the 1-cent tax on gasoline. I prefer the repeal of the dividend credit to the 1-cent additional tax on gasoline. The Senator has suggested the possibility of both.

Mr. WILEY. I appreciate the Senator's fine approach to what I believe is the real, overall problem.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator. As he knows, I have been involved in highway legislation. I have never approached it in any partisan way whatsoever. The program has had bipartisan support, and it must remain that way.

Mr. WILEY. We all agree that the deficit in the Treasury continues. This year we anticipate a deficit of $2 billion or $3 billion, I believe, if things keep on going the way they are. Much could be said in favor of the argument the Senator made in relation to not adding the 1-cent tax. But when we consider what gasoline is selling for in Britain and in other places, we realize we do not pay really half of what the British have to pay. Then when we appreciate also that the tax we collect relates to a 40-cent dollar, in value, or a 40 percent penny, we begin to realize that the tax is not very high on gasoline after all.

From the standpoint of taxing dividends, that argument we know. It is double taxation. There are many widows who depend upon the small dividends they get. But it seems to me what we must think about is the overall challenge to keep this country, if it is possible, on an even keel financially. I for one, would be very happy to adopt the suggestion of getting taxes from both sources.

I have not studied the matter, but in view of the figures the Senator has given us, which show a deficit this year and a deficit next year, it seems to me we are proposing to meet the problem only half way. By taking funds from the Treasury, if there are any funds there, that should be applied otherwise, it seems to me is "passing the buck."

Mr. GORE. The Senator speaks of taking away the gasoline tax. The Senator understands my amendment would not reduce the existing tax on gasoline.

Mr. WILEY. Oh, no.

Mr. GORE. It would merely substitute a repeal of the dividend credit for the proposed 1-cent increase.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I wish to answer the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], and then I will yield to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

The highway bill (H.R. 8698) now before the Senate provides for a severe slowup of the program. It would reduce the authorized apportionment from the level of $2,500 million per year on the interstate and defense system, to $2 billion for fiscal 1961, of which only $1,800 million could actually be apportioned. According to the tables which the Senator will find in the committee hearings, this slowup and stretchout provided in H.R. 8678 would mean that the highway system would not be completed until 1977. This would destroy the whole concept of an integrated National System of Interstate and Defense Highways completed within a generation's time, and at design standards equal to the traffic needs of 1975.

I say this bill is inadequate. It is unacceptable. It will not solve the problem this year, next year, or in the future.

It fails to meet the problem this year. It makes the problem worse next year. It provides a stretchout, which means that these highways may not be completed within the lifetimes of many Members of the U.S. Senate.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It seems to me we might observe what has happened taxwise in this administration.

The first thing this administration did in 1954 was to give us its rich man's tax relief bill. That started out being 375 pages long, without one line in there to help the workingman, and yet it meant about $6 billion or $7 billion of tax relief. We finally put on there some reduction in excise taxes, not the gasoline tax.

This particular one that the Senator wants to take away, this dividend credit, is an amendment which was adopted in the House of Representatives under a rule, and that is the only way in which this provision could have become law, and the Senator knows as well as I do that this particular provision was adopted in the House of Representatives under a closed rule, under which the House could not vote on the merits of the proposal. I am glad that I was one of those who voted against the dividend credit in the Senate at the time when the Senate voted by a majority of, I believe, about 4 to 1, and knocked this dividend credit out of the tax bill. However, the House conferees never permitted the House to vote on it. They were able to sustain their original position to keep this provision in the law. If the House had ever had a chance to vote on this proposition, they would have killed it, just as the Senate had by a 4-to-1 majority.

The administration recommended and helped to put into law this provision which helps corporation stockholders. Mr. President, it has helped the wealthy of this country. It is a completely unnecessary, unjustified tax advantage to those people.

Having given all this tax advantage to all those in higher income tax brackets, the administration has brought us two different bills, one to increase the gasoline tax, and then another one to raise it another cent.

I think the Senator will find that if his amendment wins again, the Senate will express itself that this tax advantage is not justified, and on the other hand we will put the tax back on those who are well able to pay.

If more money is needed, it seems to me the Senator suggests the obvious way to get it. Here is one place where we could get some revenue very easily, surely, and it is certainly preferable to these continual increases in the gasoline taxes.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator for his support. I desire to suggest again that the tax favoritism to income from dividends operates to the discrimination of the person who invests in local community improvement. If one builds a building or a business in his hometown from which he receives personal income, he is taxed on that income at the regular rate, but the person who turns away and buys bonds or General Motors stock and receives his income from that, gets a tax advantage. If the Senate is not aware of how great that advantage becomes, I should like to point out that the persons with an income of under $3,000 receives, on the average a credit of $18, while a person with an income of $1 million or more receives, on the average a credit of $38,995.

I should like to put into the RECORD, Mr. President, a compilation that has been made which shows the amount of tax saved by this dividend tax credit device.

There being no objection, the compilation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Who benefits and how much?—The dividend credit tax loophole, 1957

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. If the Senator will yield again, one reason the administration is trying to tell us we are not responsible unless we vote to raise interest rates on the national debt, these corporation stocks are so much more attractive to these people than Government bonds, and one of the reasons is that they get this tax advantage on dividends on corporation stocks.

Mr. GORE. I think it is an unsound tax advantage or favoritism to income from dividends that cannot be justified. Some mention has been made of double taxation. That is a canard. Under the law a corporation is one person; a stockholder is another.

I do not wish to argue at length about the matter of this tax. The Senate has voted on it once already this year. As the able Senator has pointed out, the Senate has by rollcall vote with a heavy majority voted to repeal it. It has also voted with a heavy majority against the assessment of an additional tax on gasoline.

Here we have a clean, clear-cut, simple choice between two things: First, a Federal sales tax of 1 cent on every gallon of gasoline bought by every man, woman, and child in America or its possessions or, second, the repeal of this tax favoritism.

I should like to point out that neither will completely solve the highway program, either this year, next year, or in later years.

Mr. President, what I have proposed is a dedication of enough of the excise taxes on automobiles to the highway trust fund to meet the deficit in the trust fund this fiscal year and to meet the anticipated deficit in future years through 1964. I hope the Senator understands that.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Senator knows, because we have talked together, that I am very sympathetic with his point of view and that if there is any possible alternative, I wish to utilize it instead of passing this regressive tax on gasoline which I think is utterly against the interests of the ordinary American citizen.

The tax on gasoline in my State is presently 5 cents, and that is too high. The Federal tax is 3 cents and it would go up to 4 under this bill. That will make a total of 9 cents taken out of the pockets of the relatively poor as well as those of middle income and the rich and the corporations. I think that kind of regressive sales tax is a great mistake, and therefore I support the general point of view which my friend from Tennessee has indicated.

I want to ask the Senator from Tennessee if he will be kind enough to turn to his amendment and answer a couple of questions for me. As I understand it, on page 2 of his amendment "D," under the subheading "Excise Tax on Passenger Automobiles," does the Senator find that?

Mr. GORE. I have it.

Mr. CLARK. As I understand, the Senator proposes to transfer out of the general fund of the United States enough in terms of excise taxes on passenger automobiles to permit the highway program to go forward for the indefinite future at the rate contemplated when the legislation was passed. It that correct?

Mr. GORE. I am sorry that it will not accomplish all those purposes. The transfer will approximate $500 million this year.

Mr. CLARK. Five hundred and twenty million dollars, I believe.

Mr. GORE. Well, I am speaking in round figures. As the Senator knows, these are estimates, and we cannot speak in exact terms. I believe, as a matter of fact, that the estimate is about $520 million. The estimate deficit is $493 million.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. GORE. So far as the present year is concerned, the amendment would solve our fiscal problem, and it would allow the Federal Government to honor its commitments to the States, rather than to be in default.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. GORE. I cannot assure the Senator from Pennsylvania, however, that that amount of money transferred to the highway trust fund will permit the highway program to continue in the future at the full rate authorized in the schedule of apportionments in the 1958 act.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GORE. It would be much closer, however, than would be provided by the House bill now before the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The figures which I have before me, and which I understand were prepared jointly by the Senator's staff and by my staff indicate that for fiscal year 1961 the highway fund deficit would, if nothing were done, be $816 million, whereas the Senator, as shown on page 2 of his pending amendment, would have the portion of the excise taxes which would be transferred to the highway fund increase from 4 percent to 6 percent. This would raise $804 million, which would still permit the highway program for fiscal 1961 to go forward at the present rate, because there will be enough surplus from 1960 to more than make up the difference between $804 million and $816 million.

Mr. GORE. That is correct.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place a table in the RECORD at this point. This table shows the estimated amount of auto excise tax revenue which would be transferred to the highway trust fund under my amendment.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, what is the source of the figures the Senator wishes to place in the RECORD?

Mr. GORE. The table shows the amount of money which would be transferred from the general fund to the highway trust fund by the terms of the amendment which I have offered. The estimates come from the Bureau of Public Roads.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—can the Senator answer this question for me——

Mr. GORE. Will not the Senator permit the statement to go into the RECORD?

Mr. SCOTT. I withhold the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Estimated receipts from auto excise tax

Fiscal year	Percent	Receipts
		Millions
1960	4	$520
1961	6	804
1962	6	828
1963	6	858
1964	6	882
Total		3,892

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say to my good friend and colleague from Pennsylvania that I am in the midst of trying to develop what the amendment would do, and I would appreciate it if my colleague would allow me to finish.

Mr. SCOTT. I am very happy to defer to my colleague until he finishes.

Mr. CLARK. I appreciate the courtesy of my colleague.

I ask my friend from Tennessee if it is not true that, on the basis of the figures which have just beeen introduced into the RECORD, transfers of the excise tax on passenger automobiles, which my friend from Tennessee contemplates by his amendment, would, so far as we can now estimate, permit the highway plan to go forward at the contemplated rate for the indefinite future.

Mr. GORE. At the rate provided for this fiscal year and fiscal year 1961, it would meet the problem of the deficit existing now and the deficit which looms for next year. It would fall somewhat short of the anticipated deficit in years following if full apportionments are made as authorized.

Mr. CLARK. The table which I have before me indicates trust fund balances as a result of the transfers my friend contemplates, for all fiscal years through 1964. I ask him whether perhaps I have been misinformed.

Mr. GORE. That is true; but it would not provide sufficient funds to permit apportionment at the full levels contained in the 1958 act, for years beyond 1962, because funds apportioned for 1963 would require disbursements extending into 1965.

Mr. CLARK. Could we not agree that the transfer contemplated by my friend in his amendment D would put the highway fund in funds to continue the present program at the contemplated rate at least through the fiscal year 1962?

Mr. GORE. That is true; and perhaps beyond. But I do not wish to claim too much for it. I wish to make it emphatic to my colleagues in the Senate that the bill now before the Senate would solve none of these problems. It would leave a deficit this fiscal year of $160 million, with which we would have to start the next fiscal year, after the Federal Government had been in default to the States to the extent of $160 million; and the trust fund would have a deficit of perhaps $660 million at the middle of fiscal year 1961; and still have a deficit of $50 million at the end of fiscal year 1961.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. By transfers from general funds in the ordinary budget of sums sufficient to take care of the highway program through fiscal year 1962, under his amendment my friend contemplates, does he not, making up a part—but a part only—of what he takes out of the general fund by repealing the 4 percent dividend credit?

Mr. GORE. The Senator is correct. I say in all candor, as I have tried to say before, that the amendment would transfer from the general fund 4 percentage points of the tax on automobiles to the highway trust fund in the fiscal year 1960. This amounts to approximately $520 million, to meet the estimated deficit of $493 million.

To come to the point just made by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, my amendment proposes to bring new revenue into the general fund in the amount of $335 million, accomplished through a repeal of the dividend tax credit; and the House bill provides new revenue in the sum of $333 million by way of a 1 cent increase in the tax on gasoline.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I am in complete accord with the Senator's objective. I am against the 1-cent increase in the tax on gasoline, except as a last resort. I am in favor of transferring to the highway fund enough money to permit the highway program to go forward as contemplated; but I am strongly opposed to not refurbishing the general fund by closing other tax loopholes which will make it possible for us, on this side of the aisle, to show that we are putting back into the Treasury not only what we take out for the highway fund, but a little more, to help balance the budget for 1960, 1961, and 1962.

So I say to my good friend from Tennessee that I will wholeheartedly support his amendment; and if it is adopted, I will support the amendment which my good friend from Minnesota is prepared of offer as soon as the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is disposed of. That would impose a tax at the source on dividends, just as we have taxation at the source on wages.

That would come closer to filling the gap. Therefore I shall myself offer loophole closings which will impose a tax at the source on interest, which would more than equal the revenue transfered to the highway trust fund and follow that with the gift-entertainment-dues-expense account stiffening amendment. We would end up by putting back into the general fund several hundred million dollars more than we take out.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator. I shall listen with interest to the discussion of the amendment he proposes to offer later.

I wish to invite attention to the amendment now before the Senate, which would meet the fiscal problem of the highway trust fund this year, and without which, I warn each Member of this body, the Federal Government will be in default to the States, and the States will either be in default with respect to contracts performed, upon which payment is due, or the legislatures will have to meet to provide funds, unless they can be provided from some other source to avoid default.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator answer this question: Why is it unfair that those who use the highways should pay for the use of the highways?

Mr. GORE. I do not believe I have said that it was entirely unfair. I believe they should bear a heavy portion of the cost, but I do not believe they should bear the entire cost, because there are so many other interests which benefit, including national defense, automobile companies, tire companies, and other industries which depend upon highway transportation. However, even if we accept the thesis which the able Senator advocates, the highway users are already paying far more than enough. One billion, six hundred million dollars in revenue from highway user taxes is being diverted to purposes other than the highways this year.

Mr. SCOTT. I wonder why the Senator from Tennessee and also my senior colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] are trying to find some other way, some other tax, or loophole, to pay for the highway system without facing the basic problem, which is that if the people of the United States want certain benefits, they ought to know that those benefits cost money. They ought to be aware that if they are extracting from the Federal Treasury all kinds of benefits, assistance, assurances, gifts, grants, and donations, those things have to be paid for. If those who use the highways desire, as we all do, better highways, safer highways, more elaborate highways, and more automobiles on the highways, what is wrong, I again ask, why not say: "You should be aware that you must pay for what you use?" That was a good American tradition for a long time. What is wrong with it now?

Mr. GORE. I know that it has not been possible for the junior Senator from Pennsylvania to hear all the remarks of the junior Senator from Tennessee. Therefore, I doubt that the Senator understands fully the amendment which I propose. I have proposed to do just that. I propose to bring into the Treasury——

Mr. SCOTT. I cannot agree that the amendment does that.

Mr. GORE. I propose to bring into the Treasury the same amount of revenue which the House bill proposes, but I propose to do it in a more equitable way. I propose to do it by closing a tax loophole, rather than by levying a heavier sales tax on this essential commodity. I think I have answered the Senator.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. I merely wish to make a slight observation, preparatory to asking a question. It certainly would not shock the sensitivities of the junior Senator from Rhode Island to vote to repeal the credit against dividend income. I have done it twice before. But I simply do not see the compatibility. While I understand the objective of trying to raise money in order to fill a gap which is created by appropriating money from the general fund in order to continue the accelerated Federal-aid highway program, why would it not be better, since we are trying to close tax loopholes, in order to pick up the money which is necessary, if the money is to be appropriated from the general Treasury——

Mr. GORE. The Senator understands that the additional revenue from repeal of the dividend tax credit would go into the general fund, does he not?

Mr. PASTORE. I realize that.

Mr. GORE. And that 4 percentage points of the automobile tax is dedicated to the highway trust fund.

Mr. PASTORE. I realize that. But why do we not look to greener pastures? Why do we not look to the repeal of the oil depletion allowance of 27½ percent? Why do we not consider closing a loophole which is a real loophole, one which is almost as big as a hole which would be created by the dropping of a hydrogen bomb? If we are to be guided by relativity and compatability it seems to me that we stand face to face with this source—the oil depletion allowance.

Mr. GORE. I have voted affirmatively upon amendments seeking to reduce the deduction for oil depletion. I seek here not to solve all the inequities in the tax laws, but to prevent an additional inequity from being enacted by substituting therefor repeal of one of the inequities, as I regard it, which would bring in approximately the same amount of money.

Mr. PASTORE. I realize that. I applaud the Senator from Tennessee for it. But on the scope of compatibility, we are allowing the oil industry to get away with a 27½ percent depletion allowance. I do not know what the historic background for it may have been, but today, when everyone is forced to pay high taxes, why should the oil people, get a 27½ percent depletion allowance on oil production? Why should we not fill in that gap and take the money which is coming out of oil and use it to build highways, so that more people can buy more gasoline? And the profit circle would bring back much of the sacrificed bonus of the depreciation allowance we take away.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Rhode Island convinces me all the more that so long as so many tax loopholes exist, it is utterly unfair to solve all our tax problems by levying heavier and heavier Federal sales taxes.

Mr. PASTORE. But does not the Senator think that it would sit better with the American people if we concentrated on gasoline and oil? The 27½ percent oil depletion allowance is very fertile ground. Perhaps it is time to cut that allowance down. We could spend part of those billions to build the best roads in America—expanding this great income source of the oil industry.

Mr. GORE. I must acknowledge that if that loophole were closed, it would bring in revenue far in excess of the 1 cent tax on gasoline.

Mr. PASTORE. Why are we afraid to do it?

Mr. GORE. I am not. Is the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. PASTORE. I think the Senator from Tennessee ought to amend his amendment. Then I could vote for it.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not let his amendment be defeated by being led astray and accepting the proposal made by the Senator from Rhode Island. The reason why it will not be possible to finance the highway construction by cutting the 27½ percent oil depletion allowance is that there are not enough votes in the Senate to do it. It is just that simple.

What the Senator is trying to do is to take away a tax advantage which the Senate has repeatedly expressed itself as being opposed to, but which the House will vote to take away if the House ever gets a chance to vote on it.

I urge the Senator from Tennessee not to let himself be led astray. When the oil depletion tax matter came to a vote in the Senate some time ago, it was defeated overwhelmingly.

The Senator has an amendment which I believe might be agreed to. I point out these figures: Highway users are paying $3,885 million a year right now in excise taxes on gasoline, lubricating oil, passenger cars, trucks, buses, automobile parts, tires, tubes, rubber, and diesel fuel. The total comes to almost $4 billion.

Mr. GORE. In addition to the payment of those taxes, the highway users pay every other tax which everyone else pays. They pay excise taxes; they pay income taxes.

I appreciate the fact that there are a number of inequities in the tax laws. I submit that we have before us in H.R. 8678 a proposal to levy an additional inequity. Gasoline is an essential commodity which every person must use, and it is already bearing a higher tax than any other necessity in America. Yet it is proposed to levy an additional Federal sales tax upon every gallon of gasoline.

As the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] pointed out, the principal reason why so many Americans are buying small foreign cars is that such cars consume less gasoline. Do not think that the price of gasoline is not a matter of concern to the American people.

Only the other day, I walked out of my abode and engaged a taxicab to come to the Senate Office Building. I do not recall that I had ever seen the driver of that taxicab. For some reason, he recognized me as being the junior Senator from Tennessee. He pulled off to the right side of the street, turned around, and with enthusiasm said, "I thank you for fighting this increase in the gasoline tax. With this car, I make a living for myself, my wife, and my three children. I am already paying about $300 in gasoline taxes a year. If that tax is raised any more, it will reduce my standard of living. It will increase my cost of living."

I point out, incidentally, that that man does not use the interstate highways at all in his business, as most people do not.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I promised to yield first to the junior Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I am in complete accord with and support the amendment of the junior Senator from Tennessee. I agree wholeheartedly that the proposed tax is a super sales tax. I had occasion to have some research done this morning in the U.S. statistical book. The combined State and Federal taxes on gasoline, on the national average, today total $63.92. The 1-cent a gallon increase advocated by the administration will add another 10 percent to that amount. That will put the total average of gasoline tax above $70 a year for the average automobile user. It does not include the taxicab driver, who makes his living by driving his cab. It includes the wage earner who has bought a house with a GI or an FHA loan, a house which is 15 or 20 miles from his place of work. Such a person's cost of transportation is as essential a part of his cost of living as the bread, butter, and milk he buys for his children, because otherwise he cannot earn his income.

Mr. GORE. This is a regressive tax. It is completely unfair, as I have pointed out. It levies an additional tax burden on a necessity which already bears the heaviest tax of any essential commodity.

Mr. MONRONEY. Let me further illustrate the impact: When this tax reaches $70 per automobile, it will be the equivalent of a 2 percent sales tax on $3,500 a year, which is more than the annual income the average man has. Yet the tax now proposed would bring the total tax to $70 a year, which would be the same as the total sales tax, at the rate of 2 percent, which the average wage earner pays on all the other things he purchases in a year. No commodities, except liquor, are taxed as heavily as are gasoline and oil.

Mr. GORE. And all luxuries are taxed at a lower rate than the tax on this essential commodity—gasoline.

Mr. MONRONEY. One who purchases diamond rings, platinum watches, or strings of pearls is required to pay a maximum tax of 10 percent, I believe, regardless of just what luxury he may purchase. But, today, the average State gasoline tax is 6 cents a gallon, and it is now proposed to increase the Federal gasoline tax to 4 cents a gallon—which will make a total tax of 10 cents a gallon, which amounts to more than a 33⅓-cent tax on gasoline.

Mr. GORE. On the basis of the retail price.

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes, on the basis of the retail level price. On the basis of the price at the refinery, that total tax amounts to a tax of approximately 100 percent.

Mr. GORE. That will depend on the State involved. In many States, the State tax is 7 cents a gallon, and the Federal tax is 3 cents a gallon; and I am told that the refinery cost of gasoline is approximately 10 cents a gallon. So, in that event, the total tax on gasoline is approximately 100 percent of its cost at the refinery.

Where is there another commodity which is taxed so heavily?

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield further to me?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. This morning, I was amazed to realize the sleight-of-hand trick acomplished by transferring the cost of the ABC program—the cost of the normal State highway program, for which the Federal Government contributes on a 50–50 basis—from the general revenue fund to the highway trust fund; but the revenue from the ABC program—in other words, from the tax on automobiles, and so forth—was not transferred to the highway trust fund. So we find that those expenses were charged to the highway trust fund; but none of the income from the automobile excise tax, the tax on lubricating oil, and so forth, was transferred to the highway trust fund.

Yet the Federal Government has had, since 1934, a law which prohibits the States from spending the highway users' tax on things other than highways; and if that law is violated, the State's allocation is reduced to one-third.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Oklahoma is now referring to the Hayden-Cartwright Act, is he not?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct; and it has been on the statute books since 1934.

Mr. GORE. By means of that policy, that requirement is made of the States; but the Federal Government does not proceed to do likewise. Will the Senator from Oklahoma refer to that policy again?

Mr. MONRONEY. That law has been in force since 1934. It requires the States to spend on highway uses the revenue they obtain from their highway users' tax—in other words, the tax revenue from automobile licenses, the tax on automobile tires, the State gasoline tax, and other items spelled out in the law. Yet the Federal Government—which makes that requirement of the States—has not only preempted this field, now, for general taxation, while moving $800 million of expenses out of the revenue fund and into the highway trust fund, but has not increased the revenue going into the highway trust fund.

I understand this is what the Senator from Tennessee is trying to correct. He is trying to move into the highway trust fund, not all of that tax revenue, although the Federal Government requires the States to do that, but only 40 percent of the excise tax on automobiles.

Mr. GORE. Yes, the tax on automobiles only.

Mr. MONRONEY. And that will leave more than $1 billion of the highway users' tax to go into the general fund.

Mr. GORE. Approximately $1,100 million.

Mr. MONRONEY. And the Senator from Tennessee would go even further, because he proposes a much needed correction in that connection; he is attempting to close the tax loophole by means of the 4 percent dividend credit. He proposes that that be replaced with the revenue which his proposal would transfer. It not that correct?

Mr. GORE. That is correct.

Mr. President, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] raised the question of highway user taxes. I wish to point out that in the 1956 Act, the Congress increased the gasoline tax from 2 cents a gallon to 3 cents a gallon; increased the tax on diesel fuel from 2 cents a gallon to 3 cents a gallon; increased the tax on automobile tires from 5 cents to 8 cents per pound; imposed a tax of 3 cents per pound on tread rubber—which had not previously been taxed; increased the excise tax on trucks, buses, and trailers from 8 percent to 10 percent, for 1957, and from 5 percent to 10 percent from 1958 to 1972; and a new truck use tax was levied at $1.50 a thousand pounds.

Those additional taxes were levied in 1956. Those taxes were levied or increased by the Congress to pay for the highway program. But highway user taxes are being diverted to other uses.

I also wish to point out to my friend, the Senator from Oklahoma, and to my other fellow Senators, that the choice presented by means of my amendment is not simply between levying an additional 1 cent tax on every gallon of gasoline or repealing the dividend credit; the choice is also between having the Federal Government in default to the States to the extent of $160 million, ths year, or being able to meet its obligations fully.

How can the Senate exercise any honorable choice other than to provide the necessary funds to meet this commitment?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from Tennessee mentioned my name, will he yield to me?

Mr. GORE. In just a moment. I have been having a colloquy with the Senator from Oklahoma, and I wish to finish it, first.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee will yield further, I wish to say a question was raised as to why the highway users do not pay more of the cost of the Interstate System of Highways. I believe the Senator from Tennessee has already explained that already they are paying, paying, paying, and paying. Today, I took occasion to call Mr. Tallamy, the head of the Bureau of Public Roads; and I asked how much of the average automobile mileage is traveled—according to his studies—on the Interstate Highway System—since we are going to provide additional funds for it, and are expected to increase the gasoline tax until it will be 10, 11, or 12 cents a gallon.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order: There is too much conversation in the Chamber, particularly by those who stand behind me; and there is too much noise in the Chamber. I ask for order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Senators who desire to carry on conversations will retire to the cloakrooms. The aides of the Senate will be silent and will find seats.

Mr. MONRONEY. So, Mr. President, I was amazed to find that only 20 percent of the automobile mileage is traveled on the Interstate System highways.

Mr. GORE. Yet this tax will apply to all those who purchase gasoline, regardless of the roads on which they drive.

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes, including the taxi drivers who travel only in the cities.

I repeat that only 20 percent of the passenger car mileage of the Nation is traveled on the Interstate System highways, according to the Bureau of Public Roads. Yet the automobile users already are paying far more than the highway users' tax, and are carrying a great deal of the general tax load for the Nation's defense, social welfare programs, health programs, and so forth.

Certainly it is high time that we provide general revenue taxes to take care of general revenue items, and transfer—as would be done by means of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee—some of the automobile users' tax receipts—such as those from the automobile excise tax—to help defray a part of the vast cost of this necessary System of Interstate Highways.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GORE. In one moment.

At this time I wish to point out to my friend, the junior Senator from Oklahoma, that by means of the pending amendment, I do not propose to stop all of that diversion. I propose to dedicate to the highway trust fund only 4 percent of the 10-percent excise tax on automobiles in fiscal year 1960. My amendment would not touch the revenue from the tax on trucks, buses, trailers, automobile parts and accessories and other highway user taxes which now go to the general fund. Still there will be diverted, after my amendment is enacted, approximately $1,100 million for building of highways in Burma, or for other purposes, whatever they may be.

I yield now to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. Would the distinguished Senator, for purposes of clarification, tell me this: Do I understand the Senator abandoned his proposal for a rescission of 1 percent of the general revenues.

Mr. GORE. I have that amendment pending at the desk. I hope this amendment will be adopted. I would prefer the closing of a tax loophole to a rescission of appropriations. If the Senate should, unfortunately, decline to accept the pending amendment, I will then propose the amendment to which the Senator has made reference.

Mr. SCOTT. In other words, if the pending amendment fails, it is the intention of the Senator from Tennessee to propose a general rescission of 1 percent of the general revenues. Is that correct?

Mr. GORE. Well, I would not say general; it is general with the exception of statutory requirements, such as for veterans' pensions and interest on our public debt. But I do not wish to discuss that amendment at this time. Let us not confuse that amendment with the pending amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. I was hoping the Senator would answer a relevant question. Would his proposal not include rescission of 1 percent of the $40 billion of the defense budget, and would not it take away $400 million from the defense of the United States?

Mr. GORE. That question is not now before the Senate, and I hope the Senator will not try to confuse the issue. The pending question is very simple.

Mr. SCOTT. May I ask——

Mr. GORE. Well, now——

Mr. SCOTT. On this amendment, then. I will confine myself to this pending amendment with one further question.

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator inform me how much revenue he expects to be gained by this amendment in its several parts?

Mr. GORE. It has only one part relating to additional revenue.

Mr. SCOTT. It relates to the excise tax——

Mr. GORE. The Senator misunderstands. There is only one source of revenue provided in the amendment, and that is the repeal of the dividend credit.

Mr. SCOTT. How much then would go to the general fund?

Mr. GORE. An estimated $335 million, and that estimate comes from the Treasury Department.

Mr. SCOTT. So that that $335 million taken from the general fund must be raised in some other manner if we are going to raise the $40 billion for the defense budget?

Mr. GORE. I am sorry the Senator does not understand the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. I suspect I am not the only one.

Mr. GORE. If he will join me on the couch in the back, I will endeavor to explain it to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. I do not propose to psychoanalyze the able Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the distinguished Senator. I actually seek information. I should like some enlightenment. If I am correct, will the Senator please so advise me? The Senator simply would take the excise tax on passenger automobiles as now levied——

Mr. GORE. In part. The levy is now 10 percentage points. I would transfer 4 percentage points to the highway fund in fiscal 1960.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Four out of the ten.

Mr. GORE. 40 percent.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The Senator would transfer that money from the general fund into the highway trust fund.

Mr. GORE. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The deficit in the general fund has to be made up. So the Senator wants to make up that deficit in the general fund by repealing the dividend credit now in the tax law. Is that, simply stated, the amendment of the Senator?

Mr. GORE. That is correct. The senior Senator from Arkansas understands it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I came into the Chamber a little late. The Senator proposes simply to transfer permanently 40 percent of the excise tax now in effect on passenger automobiles into the trust fund for highway construction.

Mr. GORE. For this year.

Mr. McCLELLAN. For this year only.

Mr. GORE. Then 6 percentage points the following 4 years.

Mr. McCLELLAN. How much is it estimated will that take out of the general fund for this year?

Mr. GORE. $520 million.

Mr. McCLELLAN. $520 million.

Mr. GORE. May I point out how we arrived at that amount? The deficit in the highway trust fund this year is estimated to be $493 million. The 40 percent of the excise tax on automobiles will produce an amount as nearly equal to that amount as could practicably be selected.

Mr. McCLELLAN. In other words, that amount is adequate to make up the deficit?

Mr. GORE. That is right; it is adequate.

Mr. McCLELLAN. To replenish the general fund, into which the passenger automobile tax is now going, the Senator simply proposes to repeal the dividend tax credit now allowed?

Mr. GORE. That is right.

Mr. McCLELLAN. How much revenue will the repeal produce?

Mr. GORE. $335 million, according to an estimate of the Treasury Department, which compares, I point out, to an estimate of $333 million from the proposal in the House bill of a 1-cent increase in the gasoline tax.

Mr. McCLELLAN. In other words, the levy on the gasoline tax will amount to only $333 million, according to the estimate?

Mr. GORE. That is correct, for fiscal 1960. I should like to say that I disagree with the recommendation of the administration that we should impose an additional gasoline tax. If the problem is to be solved in that manner, however the Administration was correct in asking for a 1½ cent additional tax, instead of a 1-cent tax. An additional tax of one cent will not do the job. The provision for a 1-cent tax as contained in the House bill will leave a deficit in the highway trust fund of $160 million this year, and that means the Federal Government will be in default to our States.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does the transfer of funds from the passenger automobile tax adequately cover the deficit?

Mr. GORE. This year.

Mr. McCLELLAN. For this year?

Mr. GORE. And next year.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The Senator proposes to make up a part of that deficit by a repeal of the dividend allowance. Is that correct?

Mr. GORE. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Some money will still be taken out of the general fund, however? That will not be replenished?

Mr. GORE. That is correct. I seriously considered proposing a transfer from the general fund only of the amount equal to the amount the dividend credit repeal would bring in, but I could not bring myself to do so because it would not solve the problem at all. It would still leave a deficit in the highway trust fund. As the Senator knows, as long as he has been a Member of the Congress, we have made apportionments, and the State governors and the State legislatures and the State highway departments have depended upon them. They have never been questioned before.

Mr. McCLELLAN. May I state my understanding of the proposal? With the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, we are given the choice of substituting a repeal of a dividend allowance, which is now received under existing law, or raising the gasoline tax by 1 cent. Is that correct?

Mr. GORE. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Will either completely solve the problem?

Mr. GORE. No.

Mr. McCLELLAN. We are still left without the problem being fully resolved, either way we go?

Mr. GORE. Well, there is another provision in my amendment about which the Senator has interrogated me. The other part of my amendment provides for a dedication of 40 percent of the revenue from the automobile tax to the highway trust fund.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I just stated that.

Mr. GORE. It would solve the fiscal problem so far as the highway trust fund is concerned. It would raise the problem which the able Senator has discussed—that we would transfer out of the general fund to the highway trust fund more money than the amendment would bring into the general fund.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is the point I was making. There would still be a deficiency or a deficit.

Mr. GORE. With my amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. How are we going to make up that deficit?

Mr. GORE. May I state what H.R. 8678 does? It raises approximately only the same amount of revenue my amendment proposes. One amount is $335 million; the other is $333 million.

Mr. McCLELLAN. In other words, does the Senator think there would be about the same deficit, either way we go? Is that right?

Mr. GORE. Not quite. The House bill, however, would let the States bear the deficit by having the Federal Government default on a commitment that we have made, under which the States have awarded contracts. The contracts are being performed. When a contract is completed, as the able Senator knows, the contractor expects to be paid. How is the State going to pay the contractor? The House bill leaves a deficit in the trust fund, according to the testimony—it is all in the hearings of yesterday—of $160 million in this fiscal year and a deficit next year which will be substantially larger, at least until near the close of the next fiscal year.

Mr. McCLELLAN. If I may, I should like to make one brief observation and then conclude. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. GORE. I will say that after the catechism of the able senior Senator from Arkansas the question has been brought so plainly and simply before the Senate I think the best thing I can do is take my seat. The Senator has contributed greatly by bringing the points into focus.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The Senator from Tennessee contributed greatly to my understanding. I thought I understood the matter, but it has been clarified.

I should like to make one other observation, if the Senator will permit. What is attractive to me about the Senator's proposal is that I have long desired to see the gasoline tax and the automobile taxes—the revenues raised from those sources—applied first to cover all that we spend on Federal highways.

Mr. GORE. The Senator has not only done that——

Mr. McCLELLAN. I have been anxious to see that done. We require the States not to divert any of their gasoline tax funds.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I know the fiscal situation which confronts us. We are confronted with alternatives. If we want to try to keep this thing in balance, we are simply confronted with the alternative of either placing a 1-cent additional tax on gasoline or repealing the dividend credit.

Mr. GORE. Or we can leave the Government in default to our States.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Or we will further pyramid the national debt.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. GORE. I yield first to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. If I may, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Arkansas for a minute.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. I heard the Senator's interesting colloquy with the Senator from Tennessee. It is true that the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee will not make up to the general fund of the Treasury all of the money it would take out, but I shall support the Senator's amendment, because if it is adopted—and I hope it will be—then the Senator from Minnesota, the Senator from Wisconsin, and I propose to offer another amendment which will be an amendment, really, to require the deducting of the tax on interest and dividends at the source. If that amendment is agreed to, we will not only make up everything we will take out of the general fund of the Treasury, but we will provide a $100 million surplus.

Mr. GORE. I should like to add one other thing to the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas, before I yield to another Senator.

I think I referred to the suggestion of Mr. Tallamy yesterday, about contract control, before the senior Senator from Arkansas entered the Chamber. Never before, since 1916, have the apportionments which Congress has enacted every 2 years been questioned. The integrity of those apportionments was put into question yesterday, because of what Mr. Tallamy told the committee. What he said is in black and white, several times, because I questioned Mr. Tallamy at length about the matter.

Mr. Tallamy said he proposed to solve the problem of the deficit by a Federal control of State contracts, even though the State provides a 50—50 matching fund on the primary, secondary, and urban extensions. I hope every Senator will read the RECORD, before he votes to support the House bill.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield now to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from Tennessee for the very fine fight he is making against the increase in the gasoline tax. I support the Senator enthusiastically.

I should like to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the event the amendments proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania and other Senators should fail, I have an amendment I may offer to reduce the depletion allowance on oil. I think there is a great merit in what the Senator from Rhode Island has said, because this is particularly and peculiarly pertinent to a highway bill, since it involves oil, of course. As many Senators know, there are great inequities involved. Whether I offer that amendment or not will depend on whether it seems at the time that I have any chance of winning adoption of the amendment.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin very much.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the junior Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I wish to say to my distinguished colleague that I have an amendment to offer to his amendment. When I can get the floor in my own right I intend to offer the amendment.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer, and I would like to get the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I shall conclude as quickly as possible.

I now yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I hope that the Senator from Wisconsin did not indicate he intended to offer the depletion allowance amendment on top of the other amendments. As I understand the situation, only if the other amendments fail will the Senator offer the amendment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. If the Senator from Tennessee will yield for a moment, so that I may reply to the Senator from Colorado, I am delighted to have the Senator from Colorado emphasize that point. I will only offer the amendment in the event that I am required to do so because the other amendments which are offered do not pass. In that event, I feel this alternative might conceivably be considered favorably by the Senate, and in that event I may or may not offer this amendment.

Mr. CARROLL. The reason why I make that statement is that the Senator from Rhode Island said we ought to have a depletion allowance amendment offered. This has been worked on for 30 years. This is a problem which was considered in the time of President Roosevelt and in the time of President Truman. The able Senator from Louisiana, who comes from a great gas State, knows that if the amendment ever is adopted—and it is almost impossible ever to have it adopted in the first place—it would be vetoed at the White House.

I say we should stick to first things first. The Senator from Tennessee has made a very able presentation. It is so clear that even the Senator from Colorado can understand it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I shall take only 1 additional minute.

It would be hard to overestimate the importance of our highway program. According to recent estimates, approximately 40,000 American citizens were killed in wrecks on our inadequate highways last year. Even with this program which we have underway, we are not meeting the need for better highways.

Through World War II and through the Korean war, because of a shortage of money and material, we let our highway improvement program take a back seat. Now we have a vigorous program designed to bring our highways to a condition of adequacy, in all of the categories, by 1975. I urge the Senate not to leave the program in default, and to provide equitable and adequate financing for the program.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question on an entirely different point? I wanted to wait until the other Senators had exhausted their questions on the money angle.

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I have a question to ask the Senator from Tennessee regarding history. In the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956, section 116, subparagraph (c), it is stated:

> Public hearings: Any State highway department which submits plans for a Federal-aid highway project involving the bypassing of, or going through, any city, town, or village, either incorporated or unincorporated, shall certify to the Commissioner of Public Roads that it has had public hearings, or has afforded the opportunity for such hearings, and has considered the economic effects of such a location: Provided, That, if such hearings have been held, a copy of the transcript of said hearings shall be submitted to the Commissioner of Public Roads, together with the certification.

My question of the distinguished Senator is this: Is it the Senator's understanding—and was it the Senator's understanding at the time the legislation was written—that, with regard to a highway project involving the bypassing of a community, the wishes of the community were to be considered by the State highway body?

In other words, let us consider that it might be found desirable, under the formula set up by the Bureau of Public Roads, to buypass a small town. Was that town to be allowed a chance to say something about the bypassing before it was done?

Mr. GORE. The Senator has read the provision of the law which is still in effect. The law does not make mandatory that a hearing be held, but it makes mandatory that there be an opportunity for a hearing, if a community desires it.

Permit me to make one additional point. The act provided that the highways should be located and constructed so as to give equal consideration, insofar as practicable, to intrastate traffic and interstate traffic.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. My reason for asking the question is that in the Far West, as the Senator knows, interstate highways do not have the importance of intrastate highways, and when a State like the State which I represent, in part, goes into a program of interstate highways, it realizes that what we are attempting to do, in essence, is to provide a means for tourists in the East to get to California a little earlier. I do not know why anyone should want to do so, but, nevertheless, that is what they are doing. Likewise, they are providing means for people from California to get to the eastern part of our country. Therefore, as the Senator might imagine, this has not met with general acceptance in the Western States.

I merely wished to clear up, if I could, with the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, the legislative intent of this particular subparagraph of section 116. Are these communities to have anything to say about bypassing, or is it merely subterfuge we find in the act?

Mr. GORE. So far as I am qualified to state the intent of the committee—and I am qualified to state my own intent—it was intended that every community would be afforded an opportunity to have a public hearing, if it so desired.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have one additional question, on which I will try to be brief. Is it the Senator's further recollection, in the establishment of the legislative history, that the State highway engineering body, whatever it might be called—in my State it is the highway commission—would be the organization which would first prepare the plans for the Interstate System, or was that power to be vested in the Public Roads Bureau?

Mr. GORE. The act provides for the submission of construction plans by the respective States. Those plans, including proposed design and location, are subject to approval or disapproval by the Secretary of Commerce. The initiation of projects is entirely a State matter.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Is it then clear to the junior Senator from Arizona, from what the Senator from Tennessee has just said, that the State highway body is the initiating body in this program, and not the Bureau of Public Roads?

Mr. GORE. That is correct.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I mention that point because in my State occasions have arisen when the State highway body has said they had received the plans from up above. Some bypasses involved 40 or 50 miles, and were not economically desirable or feasible. If I can have the assurance of the intent of the author of the act that the State is the level at which these plans are to be initiated, I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. GORE. There is nothing in the act which forbids the Bureau of Public Roads in the Department of Commerce from making suggestions concerning location of routes through States, but the application for approval of construction plans originates in the States, and it can originate in no other place.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I believe it should be made clear, in the event it is not fully understood, that highway users are already paying almost twice as much in excise taxes imposed on highway users as is presently going into the fund. It is not fully twice as much, but they are paying about $3,885 million in excise taxes, including the tax on automobiles. In addition, the amount going into the fund is approximately $2,200 million, I believe.

Mr. GORE. It is approximately 58 percent of the total amount collected.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. About $2,200 million. So all the Senator is saying is that highway users are already paying more than enough to pay for the highways, and $1.5 billion or perhaps $1.6 billion over and above that to finance general Government.

Mr. GORE. That is correct.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. In addition to that, they are paying all the other taxes. Ten members of the House Ways and Means Committee who voted for the bill we have before us said what the Senator is saying here. They said that highways users are already paying more than their share. Here are 10 members of the House Ways and Means Committee who send us a bill and who say there are other more fair and equitable means of raising additional funds, if we wish to adopt them. They themselves point out, in their supplemental views, there are more equitable methods of increasing the general revenues than by imposing an additional tax on gasoline.

There is very substantial support in the House of Representatives for exactly the position the Senator has taken. The trouble is that in the House the rules prevent them from voting for the kind of bill the Senator has in mind.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I appreciate the attention of my colleagues.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I propose an amendment to the amendment submitted by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee. My amendment would add a new section to the amendment, as follows:

> There will be imposed an additional 1 cent tax on gasoline, diesel fuel, and special motor fuels for the 21-month period beginning October 1, 1959, and ending June 30, 1961.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the appropriate place, insert the following:

> There will be imposed an additional 1-cent tax on gasoline, diesel fuel, and special motor fuels for the 21-month period beginning October 1, 1959, and ending June 30, 1961.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. The Senator proposes to repeal the dividend credit?

Mr. NEUBERGER. That is absolutely correct. I should like to make a few remarks, and then I shall be glad to yield.

The Senator from Tennessee and his associates are eminently correct in wanting to close tax loopholes, but I also believe we need more revenues in the Government. Let us not fool ourselves about this need. We have a $12 billion to $13 billion deficit in the fiscal year just concluded. We are not even beginning to live up to our responsibilities during the present fiscal year.

The President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain said, in their meeting a few days ago in London, that they expected the cold war between the free world and Russia to continue indefinitely, which means we are going to have vast expenditures in the field of armament throughout the future.

Only last night or the night before the distinguished Admiral Rickover told the American Legion convention we were not really doing our job in the field of education if we are to keep up with the Soviet Union in scientific and other fields.

We know there are unlimited Government responsibilities such as health we are not properly carrying, and yet already the Treasury anticipates a deficit in the current fiscal year. Therefore I believe we should close the existing tax loopholes and we should also raise the Federal gasoline tax.

Members of the Senate should know the Saturday Evening Post pays nearly 25 cents a word for fiction. There have been speeches today claiming there is a plot to raise the gasoline tax and big business wants to unload the burden of cost on the little fellow. This is fiction. Unless we consider the big petroleum companies as "papa and mama" stories, that claim is wrong. We know for months the big oil companies have carried on propaganda against President Eisenhower's proposal to raise the gasoline tax. I have here a statement published by one of the big gasoline companies, Texaco, which is headed "Stop Unwarranted Federal Gasoline Tax Increase." I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNWARRANTED FEDERAL GASOLINE TAX INCREASE

For every gallon of gasoline your car consumes you now pay State and Federal taxes that average more than 40 percent of the retail price, less tax. Yet Congress is being asked to increase the Federal tax on gasoline from 3 to 4½ cents.

Proponents of the increase argue that it is needed to prevent a deficit from developing in the Federal highway trust fund set up in 1956 to finance the network of interstate highways now under construction. The fact is there would be no deficit whatsoever in the highway trust fund if Federal automotive taxes already being collected from vehicle owners were not being used to subsidize other governmental functions. In fiscal 1958, 42 cents out of every dollar in Federal automotive taxes went into the general fund of the Treasury instead of the highway trust fund. These diverted automotive taxes would be more than sufficient to make up any anticipated deficits in the highway program.

For this reason, Texaco believes that an increase in the Federal gasoline tax is unwarranted. If you share this view, we suggest you make it a point to let your Congressman know that you do.

The combined national average of State and Federal taxes on a gallon of gasoline now amounts to 80 percent of the refinery price, 54 percent of the tank wagon price, and 41 percent of the retail price, less tax. Any further increase is unjustifiable and should be vigorously opposed.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I have also a statement published by another "papa and mama store," the General Petroleum Corp., telling us not to increase Federal gasoline taxes. I ask unanimous consent to insert that article in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The price you pay for gasoline is not the price of gasoline.

You pay 80 to 95 cents tax on 10 gallons of gasoline—30 cents Federal plus 50 to 65 cents State.

On the national average, a dollar's worth of gasoline, plus taxes, costs $1.41. No other necessity carries such a taxload.

We all want and need adequate highways. So far, highway users have been willing to shoulder a fair cost burden. What is fair should be for users to judge.

A tax once considered fair can become unfair if excessive taxes force people to drive less, or if tax money is wasted or spent for frills, or spent for nonhighway purposes.

The Federal Government puts into the highway fund less than $2 out of $3 it collects from motorists. The rest goes into the general fund.

Now, to keep the highway fund out of the red, Congress is being asked to increase the Federal gasoline tax to 45 cents on 10 gallons. This wouldn't be necessary if all Federal tax dollars collected from motorists went into highways.

Also, this year, bills to increase State gasoline taxes have appeared in 15 States. They were enacted in New York and West Virginia. They failed in Arizona, Oregon, and Washington. One is still pending in California.

We don't like to have any more tax added to your bill than you will endorse and support.

Let your representatives in Government know your feelings when a tax change is proposed. It will be too late after the tax appears on your monthly bill.

Without the tax, gasoline is a bargain in both price and quality. Since 1940, gasoline prices have gone up less than half as much as most other items in your budget, with quality constantly improving. Only the tax is high.

GENERAL PETROLEUM CORP.

Mr. NEUBERGER. At the same time, these little "papa and mama" stores, the big gasoline companies, tell us not to raise the gasoline tax to 4 cents and close up our Federal financial and fiscal deficit, as the President has recommended. What are they doing? Here is a story from the New York Times of July 28, 1959, headed "Gasoline Prices Up." I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, July 28, 1959]

GASOLINE PRICES UP—STANDARD OF INDIANA RAISES DEALER RATES IN ILLINOIS

CHICAGO, July 27.—Standard Oil Co. of Indiana raised prices of gasoline today. The increases were expected to be also adopted by other major gasoline producers.

In the Chicago metropolitan area, the price to service station dealers goes up eight-tenths cent a gallon. In northern Illinois area, the increase is 1 cent.

A spokesman for Standard said the increases restored in whole or in part price cuts made earlier this year.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Here is an article from the Wall Street Journal of August 7, 1959, stating:

In Cleveland, Standard Oil Co. (Ohio) raised the price of gasoline 1 cent a gallon at all marketing levels.

I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Esso Standard Oil Co. reduced prices of its kerosene, No. 2 fuel and diesel oils by 0.3 cent a gallon. Areas affected by the cuts include most of the Atlantic seaboard. In Cleveland, Standard Oil Co. (Ohio) raised the price of gasoline 1 cent a gallon at all marketing levels. Sohio said the increase puts the company's motor fuel prices back to where they were last fall.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Next is an article from the Wall Street Journal of August 10, 1959, headed "Sun Oil, Atlantic Refining Raise Some Gasoline Prices." I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Aug. 10, 1959]

SUN OIL, ATLANTIC REFINING RAISE SOME GASOLINE PRICES

PHILADELPHIA.—Sun Oil Co. and Atlantic Refining Co. increased wholesale gasoline prices 0.8 cents a gallon in Pennsylvania. Atlantic said it would boost the price by the same amount in Delaware.

The higher tank-wagon prices will result in a 1-cent increase at retail in Pennsylvania, where gasoline is "fair traded" at 28.9 cents for regular grades in the eastern part of the State and 28.9 cents in western Pennsylvania, including taxes.

New tank-wagon price for regular gasoline is 16.1 cents in eastern Pennsylvania and 16.9 cents in western Pennsylvania. The new tankwagon price for Atlantic gasoline in northern Delaware is also 16.1 cents, and in the southern part of the State is 16.7 cents. Tankwagon prices exclude taxes.

New York-Esso Standard Oil Co., marketing affiliate of Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey), has increased its wholesale price of gasoline to dealers 0.8 cents a gallon, effective August 8, in Pennsylvania and at Wheeling, W.Va.

The change is in line with increases by other marketers in the area.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Here is a story from the Washington Post, a newspaper published in the city where we now live temporarily, but which we hope soon to leave for a spell. It states:

Esso Standard Oil Co. announced a 1-cent increase in wholesale gasoline prices to Washington area retailers yesterday.

I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GASOLINE PRICE INCREASED HERE

Esso Standard Oil Co. announced a 1-cent increase in wholesale gasoline prices to Washington area retailers yesterday.

Horace Walker, a spokesman for the Retail Gasoline Dealers Association, said a spot check of local dealers indicated that they would pass on to the consumer, increases varying from 1 to 1.5 cents per gallon. He said he was unable to learn the reason for the increase, but expected other companies to follow suit.

The Esso increases would apply to all grades of gasoline, which sell locally at retail from 28.9 to 30.9 cents for regular, 32.9 to 34.9 for extra, and 34.9 to 36.9 for the new "super" grades.

Mr. NEUBERGER. What is the situation? The very oil companies that have been flooding the country with propaganda, and putting propaganda into each motorist's car as he comes up to the gasoline pump, against a 1-cent or 1½-cent increase in the Federal gasoline tax to maintain the roads on which these motorists drive, are constantly increasing their own prices. They bleed for the little motorist, and undertake to defend him against an increase in the gasoline tax, but they are quite ready to raise their own gasoline prices.

I have been sitting here for an hour listening to speeches by distinguished Senators, telling us that this is a great plot of big business and big corporations to load the 1-cent or 1½-cent increase in the tax—and I am willing to vote for an increase of 1½ cents in the gasoline tax—on the little fellow. Yet, all the gasoline companies are flooding the country with propaganda against President Eisenhower's proposal.

What is the situation with regard to the contention that somehow the gasoline tax must be dedicated only to the purpose of roads? There is no such doctrine in our country, and has never been any such doctrine of taxation. If that were true, why do people without children pay school taxes in every State in the Union, as they should? Why do people who live in brick apartment houses and hotels have to pay to support the fire department to enable it to put out a fire in a frame dwelling that is combustible—as they should do?

We know that our Federal and State governments collect taxes from Christian Scientists and use the money for medical research. Do Senators mean to tell me that they should not pay? The Christian Scientists are not going to draw on medical research. It is contrary to the sincere teachings of their religion. But they are taxed, and the taxes are used to promote public health activities, which they often oppose, much less acquiescing in it.

We have never had any doctrine of taxation to the effect that every dollar collected should go to the particular purpose to which it is related. If that were the case, we would take all the money from cigarette taxes and use it in cancer research, to learn more about dreaded lung cancer. We would take the taxes from liquor and use them to try to rehabilitate the 5 million victims of chronic alcoholism. Or we would take the substantial excise tax on electric light bulbs and dedicate it to hydroelectric plants, or to the TVA, or St. Lawrence Seaway, in the States of the Senators from Wisconsin and New York.

We have an opportunity to close some tax loopholes, which the Senator from Pennsylvania, the Senator from Tennessee, and other Senators have very properly excoriated.

We also have an opportunity to be responsible legislators, and to raise some money to help pay for what we need to do here and abroad, if we are to protect the free world and maintain progress at home.

Suppose in 1 year we should collect a little more than we spend, and help to whittle away a small part of the $290 billion national debt. Would that be a felony? I favor such a policy.

I have read the writings of J. M. Keynes, a very famous economist. I have often quoted him. Many of my liberal friends—and I hope I am a liberal—say that in times of depression we should have deficit financing. That may be true. It is also said that in good times we should retire the debt caused by deficit financing during the earlier depression. That time never seems to arrive.

I have offered my amendment to the amendment of my able friend from Tennessee in order that we might have in one vehicle the means of closing some of the tax loopholes and at the same time increasing revenues.

One of the most outstanding speeches I ever heard in the Senate was delivered after we passed the mutual security authorization bill by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. FULBRIGHT] who is now present in the Chamber. He pointed out that he thought the American people would rather survive in a Lark than go down to defeat and perdition in a Cadillac. If I am not mistaken—I quote from memory—he said that he thought the American people would be willing to pay higher taxes if that were necessary to maintain the free world and to maintain our competitive position with the Soviet Union and Red China.

I do not see why we should not increase the Federal gasoline tax. Certainly it is a sales tax. There are all kinds of sales taxes. There is a high sales tax on electric light bulbs. Are electric light bulbs any less a necessity than gasoline? I would rather have an old car and electric lights in my home than to have a new car and have no electric lights in my house. I cannot very well get along with a Coleman lantern, as I used to do when I was a Boy Scout or soldier camping in a tent. I have passed that age.

Women in the galleries pay a heavy sales tax every time they paint their faces. Ask them which is the greater necessity—putting on their cosmetics or getting into an automobile to go downtown. Would they rather take a street car while wearing cosmetics, or an automobile, and forgo the use of cosmetics?

There are all kinds of sales taxes on necessities. The able Senator from Tennessee has pointed out what an imposition it would be to raise the Federal gasoline tax from 3 to 4 cents a gallon; yet I do not believe I abuse the truth when I say that he, who was the predominant figure in connection with the Federal Interstate Highway Act, himself collaborated and participated in raising the Federal gasoline tax from 2 to 3 cents a gallon. How can it be sound wisdom to raise the Federal excise tax on gasoline from 2 to 3 cents a gallon, but a heinous offense to raise the same tax from 3 cents to 4 cents? Who ordains that the line of demarcation between good and evil occurs at 3 cents? If we face up to the truth, I believe we shall have to raise more revenues in this country, and not less.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. I should say that the difference might be about the same as the difference between holding a man's head 1 inch above the water and holding it 1 inch below the water. There is a significant difference.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I am probably very stupid, but I do not understand the analogy.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator says there is no difference between raising the gasoline tax from 2 to 3 cents and raising it from 3 to 4 cents.

Mr. NEUBERGER. We have had a period of inflation in between. Roads have become more costly.

Mr. McCARTHY. We have not had a period of inflation since last year.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Have we had no inflation from 1956 to 1959?

Mr. McCARTHY. Not that much.

Mr. NEUBERGER. We have had some inflation, and we have expanded the Interstate Highway System and added to the mileage.

Mr. McCARTHY. The economy has expanded, too, as has the consumption of gasoline.

Mr. NEUBERGER. It seems to me that we would have a balanced program if we were to close tax loopholes, and also increase the Federal gasoline tax. Those who drive on the roads should help to pay for them. It appears to me that this is a tax which all our States support. I do not know of any State that fails to have a gasoline tax. I do not know any Member of this body who has ever returned to his State and protested against the State gasoline tax.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I am not quite clear what the Senator's amendment would do. Would his amendment provide for the repeal of the credit on dividends received?

Mr. NEUBERGER. What my amendment does is this: At the desk is an amendment offered by the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE]. I am probably presumptuous in seeking to explain his amendment, but his amendment would repeal the credit on income tax for people who receive dividends.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The dividend credit.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Yes. He would put it in the general fund to make up for that portion of the automobile excise taxes which would be taken by his amendment from the general fund and placed in the highway trust fund.

Mr. GORE. It transfers 4 of the 10 percentage points of the excise tax on automobiles to the trust fund in fiscal 1960.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am informed that the language the Senator has prepared needs to be put in another form if it is to get the results he desires. The chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. BYRD] has some witnesses from the Treasury here. He would like to have a meeting for possibly 30 or 40 minutes. I have spoken with the author of the amendment, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE]. He thinks it might be possible, by taking a recess now, to discuss the language proposed by the Senator from Oregon to see if the matter can be straightened out. I shall move that the Senate take a recess subject to the call of the Chair, if that is agreeable to all parties.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I should like to complete my question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I wanted to have my point made clear. That is the same measure, is it not, which the Senate, so far as the repeal of the dividend credit is concerned, passed upon earlier this year?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I think the Senate passed upon it, if I am not mistaken. It was rejected in conference.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; on the floor.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is incorrect. The amendment was agreed to on the floor of the Senate by a vote of 47 to 31. It was taken to conference and was rejected in conference.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. What the Senator from Oregon is offering is not some new, radical idea; it is exactly the same proposal as that which the Senate adopted earlier this year in a different tax matter. Is that not correct?

Mr. NEUBERGER. That is correct. That is the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Just a moment. I know there is some overlapping, but what the Senator is offering is a substitute.

Mr. NEUBERGER. It is an addition.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It is the repeal of the dividend credit, is it not?

Mr. NEUBERGER. That is what the Senator from Tennessee is proposing.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. But the Senator from Oregon is adopting that, is he not?

Mr. NEUBERGER. Yes, and I am adding to it.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I am trying to understand the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Oregon. He is adding a proposal to increase the tax, which is the same as what the House has passed.

Mr. NEUBERGER. That is correct.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator from Tennessee is opposed to that, but the Senator from Oregon is offering it as an amendment to the repeal of the dividend credit, and the net result would be, if the Senator's amendment was adopted, that we would repeal all the dividend credit, which would contribute about $380 million to the Treasury and provide for an increase in the gasoline tax. Is that what the Senator's amendment does?

Mr. NEUBERGER. All my amendment does is to add to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] a 1-cent increase in the Federal motor fuel tax until July 1, 1961.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I want the Senator from Tennessee to hear me on this. If I correctly understand the amendment of the Senator from Oregon—and I believe I understand it now—it is similar to the bill passed by the House, with the addition if we should adopt it, of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I yield.

Mr. GORE. As the distinguished majority leader has pointed out, the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Oregon is in the form of a statement of intent and purpose; but to be legally applicable to the amendment I have offered, it would have to be offered in precise language as an amendment to the pending amendment. I think it would require some little time on the part of the legislative drafting service. For that reason, the distinguished majority leader has suggested that this might be an appropriate time to take a recess in order that the Senator may have his amendment drafted in a form applicable to the pending proposal.

Mr. CARROLL. I understood there was some imperfection with respect to the intent and purpose of the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Oregon. That is why I wanted the attention of the Senator from Tennessee. If the bill is drawn in the same form as it came from the House, and after the recess we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, is there any doubt in anybody's mind what will happen in conference? This matter went to conference before and was rejected. It will happen again, just as surely as I stand before the Senate now. The only chance we have, in my mind, is to pass a different bill along the lines of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. Then perhaps we can meet the issue headon.

EMERGENCY HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION FUNDS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I would like to speak briefly about a situation which is of great concern to my distinguished senior Senator [Mr. MURRAY] and myself.

As the Members of the Senate know one of the major aftermaths to the earthquake in southwestern Montana has been the need for repairing and reconstructing highways and roads. It is estimated that it will cost $6 million.

The existing Highway Act creates an emergency relief revolving fund of $30 million for reconstructing roads destroyed by castastrophes such as earthquakes. These funds are restricted to Federal aid roads and are available on a 50-50 matching basis in all instances. This program goes into operation when an emergency is declared by the Governor and concurred therein by the Secretary of Commerce.

Unfortunately the 50-50 matching formula also applies to forest, park, and Indian roads which were originally constructed with 100 percent Federal funds.

The highways and roads in southwestern Montana and Yellowstone National Park in need of repair and reconstruction are all forest, park, or Indian roads and highways that were originally constructed with 100 percent Federal moneys. It seems reasonable to expect that any repairs and reconstruction would be done on a 100-percent Federal-financing basis. The Federal Government is a self-insurer.

The existing law was geared to the Federal-aid highway program, and I feel that it was an oversight in considering emergency aid to federally constructed roads and highways.

Senator MURRAY and I introduced legislation, S. 2623, which would rectify this situation and will allow these emergency funds to be used to provide the entire amount needed to put these Federal agencies' highways and roads back into shape without placing a burden on the program of either the State or any Federal agency.

Because adjournment appears to be near at hand, we brought this matter to the attention of the Senate Public Works Committee so that it might be included as an amendment to the Highway Act in the bill that we are considering today. I am very pleased with the fine response we received from the distinguished chairman of this committee, the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], and the unanimous approval by the committee members for including the language of our bill as an amendment to the highway-financing legislation. I also wish to express my appreciation to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. Moss] for the fine job he did in supporting this measure and discussing in detail the need for such legislation. His recent trip to the earthquake area made it possible for him to give an actual account of the need for this emergency highway program.

Mr. President, this new language in the highway bill will be most helpful to restoring normal conditions in southwestern Montana and Yellowstone National Park. In addition, this bill will also apply to any future situations of this nature.

HIGHWAY ACT

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I wish to rise to mention briefly one provision included unanimously by the Senate Public Works Committee in the Highway Act. This is the Murray-Mansfield bill to extend the application of the emergency fund in the Highway Act which is used to restore roads destroyed by disaster. Up to now, forest highways, park roads and trails, forest development roads and trails, and Indian roads have been, through oversight, not covered by the emergency fund. These roads are normally constructed with 100 percent Federal funds since they are on Federal lands. The amendment will include these roads.

The fund provides a Federal share of 50 percent in restoring these roads. The amendment makes it a 100 percent Federal share on the basis that these roads are a Federal responsibility.

These are the only policy changes in existing law. The rest stands. It will still be necessary for a Governor to make a declaration and the Secretary of Commerce to concur that a disaster has occurred before 1 penny can be spent.

The checks and balances that have restricted the use of the emergency fund to disaster will continue in full force and effect.

I would be remiss if I did not say that each and every member of the Senate Public Works Committee has my heartfelt thanks for his willingness to help us to meet Montana's disaster problem, and in the process to correct an inequity in the present law. The senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] has shown his humanity and understanding. The chairman of the Roads Subcommittee [Mr. MCNAMARA] has been most helpful. The Senator from Utah [Mr. Moss] deserves credit for both going to Montana to see this problem and taking the lead in committee in securing adoption of this needed amendment. I thank each member of the committee for their bipartisan support of our effort to restore this disaster stricken area in Montana and Wyoming.

Finally, I want the RECORD to show that we had from the outset good cooperation and help from Mr. Tallamy, Director of the Bureau of Public Roads.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess subject to the call of the Chair.

At 6 o'clock and 3 minutes p.m., the Senate resumed its session and was called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. MANSFIELD in the chair).

INTEREST RATES ON SERIES E AND H U.S. SAVINGS BONDS—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, from the Committee on Finance I report favorably, with amendments, the bill H.R. 9035 to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 909) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received and printed.

FEDERAL-AID HIGHWAY ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8678) to amend the Federal-Aid Highway Acts of 1956 and 1958 to make certain adjustments in the Federal-aid highway program, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER].

LAOS AND THE COMMUNIST THREAT

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have waited a considerable part of the day to make a speech on a very important subject, in regard to which I have already issued a release. If the Senate will be so kind as to indulge me for approximately 10 minutes, I should like to proceed at this time to make the speech.

First, Mr. President, I wish to point out that, as always happens in our very complex world, while we have been engaged with measures relating to roads and other measures which are of great domestic interest and importance, our world is burning.

Some very serious things are happening in connection with our foreign policy and, I believe, the security of our country.

There is a real conflagration in Laos; and the State Department has today issued a statement which I believe commends itself—notwithstanding our present concern with domestic matters and with Senate procedure—to the consciousness of every Member.

The State Department has stated, in regard to what is happening in Laos:

> It is now clear that the Communist bloc does not intend to permit the sovereign Lao Government to remain at peace.

The State Department release ends with the following injunction to us and to the rest of the country:

> It is appropriate that this matter be brought to the world's attention. It is obvious that any further augmentation of the invading force or continued material support thereof by Communists in North Vietnam will require a major change in the nature and magnitude of the Royal Lao Government's need for support. The United States is confident that the free world would recognize such a new danger to peace and would take the action necessary. For its part the United States supports that view.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the State Department release be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JACKSON in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Following is the text of the statement issued by the State Department today on the situation in Laos:

"The United States as a member of the United Nations will fulfill in good faith the obligations assumed by it under the charter. One of these obligations is to take appropriate measures in support of the charter. To this end the United States will support United Nations consideration of the Royal Lao Government's appeal.

"The U.S. Government has repeatedly announced its strong support of the Royal Lao Government in its determination to resist Communist efforts to undermine the security and stability of Laos. On August 26, 1959, the United States announced that, in response to specific and urgent requests from the Lao Government for improving its defense position, additional aid was being authorized to permit emergency increases in the Lao Army and Militia to cope with the threat posed to that Government by the Communists. The United States announced at the same time that it would continue to support reasonable approaches to achieve a peaceful solution of the current situation in Laos.

"On August 30 a strong attack from the northeast was launched against Royal Lao Army units in the northeastern border area of Sam Neua Province. The small Lao forces in this Province had been reinforced and had begun to push back an earlier Communist salient which had extended about 50 miles from the North Vietnam border in an area northwest of the town of Sam Neua. The August 30 attack against the northeastern border area provides further evidence of the active support of Communist rebel forces within Laos from Communist North Vietnam. The attack could not have been supported nor coordinated without such outside collaboration.

"It is now clear that the Communist bloc does not intend to permit the sovereign Lao Government to remain at peace. The Communist bloc apparently intends to foment and direct a rebellion within Laos and to give extensive support to the attempt to seize important areas and otherwise to prevent the establishment of those peaceful conditions necessary to implement basic economic and social programs. In short, the Communist intervention is apparently aimed at preventing the Lao people from realizing their just hopes for a better life.

"That outside Communist intervention exists is demonstrated by (1) the assistance evidently being received by the Communist forces within Laos, including supplies and military weapons that could be provided only from Communist territory; (2) the false and ridiculous Communist propaganda emanating simultaneously from Hanoi, Peiping, and Moscow to the effect that the Lao Government has been instigated by the United States to stir up a civil war within its boundaries; (3) the continuing flow from Moscow, Peiping, and Hanoi of propaganda and false information about the situation in Laos aimed at confusing world opinion and stating that the United States is using Laos as a military base; and (4) the fact that the military outbreak in Laos has followed conferences in Moscow and Peiping between Ho Chi Minh and Soviet and Chinese Communist leaders and also conferences in Moscow between two members of the North Vietnam Politburo and Deputy Prime Minister Anastas Mikoyan.

"The latest attack upon the Lao Army in Sam Neua Province has resulted in an appeal by the Royal Lao Government for United Nations assistance. It is appropriate that this matter be brought to the world's attention. It is obvious that any further augmentation of the invading force or continued material support thereof by Communists in North Vietnam will require a major change in the nature and magnitude of the Royal Lao Government's need for support. The United States is confident that the free world would recognize such a new danger to peace and would take the action necessary. For its part the United States supports that view."

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, we may have another Korea right on our doorstep, facing us right now.

As I have said, notwithstanding the obsessions of the moment, I should like to state, as one Senator, that I think the U.S. Government is doing exactly the right thing. I hope very much that if it is necessary to organize United Nations forces, they will be organized and we will participate.

I hope very much that we will make that clear to the Security Council, which I understand meets in emergency session on Monday, and to the General Assembly of the United Nations, which should be called into speedy session if the Russians veto—and undoubtedly they will—anything the Security Council seeks to do.

Mr. President, these are times in which the world can be dealt a death blow while we argue about domestic matters which, although they seem important to us, are relatively irrelevant to our survival.

One of those things is the need to defend freedom, wherever it exists today, by the collective action of all mankind.

We have learned some lessons—among them, that a struggle for freedom, whether in Korea, at Dien Bien Phu, or in Berlin, is just as much a struggle for the survival of the United States as would be another December 7, 1941, attack on Hawaii or an attack on the mainland of the United States.

Mr. President, when we consider what has been going on today in the Senate, I believe it very important that we be reminded of these very stern facts and happenings in the world.

I hope other Senators will join in encouraging our President and our Government, in this very solemn moment and this very dangerous hour, indeed. In fact, I do not think we yet begin to understand the quality and the aggressive character of the Communist Chinese Government, and the North Vietnam Government which it backs, and the whole Communist complex in the center of Europe and in Asia, until we view their activities in this light.

Mr. President, in order to deal properly with such situations, one has to have great moral determination and great courage in terms of providing for the support of the country. It is most important that we take realistic steps which will demonstrate that courage; and I believe we owe it to the President and to the Secretary of State, who only recently has returned from abroad, and to our United Nations delegation, to demonstrate our support in these very critical hours.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words in regard to another area of the foreign policy of the United States. I shall not take very long to do so.

I had prepared remarks to be made today, in response to a significant speech made Monday, August 31, on the floor of the Senate by the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. His speech was entitled "Statement on the Middle East."

Mr. President, I realize the need to answer that speech, because one of the grave dangers we face, as I view it, is a failure to appraise with the greatest accuracy the situations in foreign relations which are so dangerous to the security of the world. I think one of them exists in the Middle East.

With the greatest of respect for my colleague [Mr. FULBRIGHT], who has so distinguished a position in the Congress—and, Mr. President, let me say, incidentally, that I have advised him that I would make this speech—I should like to address myself at this time to that subject, because it relates to an area in which I have long had a keen interest, and which I have previously discussed in the Senate.

I make these remarks in order to develop by debate the most constructive policy recommendations for our country.

It will be recalled that we had a similar debate in regard to Berlin. That debate was sparked by the distinguished junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD]; and it resulted in tremendously constructive policy determinations on the part of our Government. Indeed, only the other day the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] referred in the course of the very excellent speech he made on our foreign policy—and in the course of his speech he was so kind as to name some of us who participated—to the crystallization of foreign policy which resulted from the Berlin situation. Mr. President, it is in the same spirit that I make these remarks about the Middle East.

In his statement, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] pointed to the relative calm in the Near East and suggested that this climate offered an opportunity to improve our relationship with the United Arab Republic and other Arab States. It is interesting to compare this appraisal with that of the deputy majority leader, the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], who spoke on September 4, 1959, only a few days later, on the Middle East, saying:

> Sooner or later, we are going to have to decide who in the Middle East works sincerely and with forbearance to end the state of fear and incipient war which prevails in that region.

In the course of his remarks, the Senator from Arkansas called for a new long-range American policy, and criticized what he termed the "ad hoc measures" which, he said, had characterized our policy in the past.

Mr. President, I have followed our Near East policy most closely for more than a decade, and I share the opposition of the Senator from Arkansas to ad hoc measures. I agree that we should attempt to achieve better relationships. But, Mr. President, is this a period of "relative calm," as Senator FULBRIGHT states, which I agree is "essential to the development of representative government and economic growth among the Arab States"? My answer is, Decidedly not. I make these statements in view of the following four serious unsettling developments which persist in the Near East:

First. Threats of war to the very national existence of Israel and to the survival of its people, thus imposing a threat to the peace of the world.

Second. Continued uncertainty regarding relations between the United Arab Republic and the Soviet Union, and the threats of aggression or subversion which these relationships pose for the whole Near East.

Third. Blockade of the Suez Canal against international cargoes and shipping, in violation of international law, the Suez Canal Convention and the assurances of the Egyptian Government when it took control of the canal in 1956.

Fourth. Rejection of the initiative of the Secretary General of the United Nations to endeavor to nationalize the position of the Arab refugees through resettlement in the Arab countries where they are now located and to free them from their continued confinement to the refugee camps under international relief.

These are the dangerous issues for the Near East; they hardly sound like relative calm, but more like the state of fear. But we cannot consider our contribution to the resolution of these issues except in the context of a program for the area—in that I agree with the Senator from Arkansas, though he does not suggest such a program, but only suggests that we should have one.

Regarding the first point, threats of war to the very national existence of Israel, and thus the peace of the world, the Arab States have continued their threats to exterminate Israel and to push its people into the sea; and have, as a matter of fact, intensified their economic warfare against that free nation. Unhappily, the Arab States continue to give the unmistakable impression that they will launch armed conflict against Israel with a view to its total extermination at a time of their own choosing.

At times of crisis elsewhere in the world, the Soviets have seen fit to set counterfires in the Middle East tinderbox to divert our attention and resources. Thus, it must be realized that these threats to the existence of Israel are not only the concern of some who may feel an attachment of sentiment to it, but are a very real and deep concern to the very security of our Nation and the free world.

To think that Israel is the source of all Middle East political and military crises is, however, to overlook recent events, for internal dissension in Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, and Iraq, as well as a whole catalog of disputes between the Arab States themselves, have featured the area. However, the consistent and continuing threats of warfare against Israel remain for the Soviets the convenient button to push to set into motion another world crisis for their own ends.

The principal sore point at this time from which a major crisis could erupt is the matter of the blockade of the Suez Canal, in violation of international law.

It will be recalled that in 1951, the U.S. delegation to the United Nations voted that the Suez Canal blockade was illegal and reiterated this position when the issue came before the United Nations Security Council in 1954. This position was strongly reaffirmed in 1957 when we called upon Israel to withdraw its forces from the Sinai Peninsula and President Eisenhower declared:

> We should not assume that, if Israel withdraws, Egypt will prevent Israeli shipping from using the Suez Canal or the Gulf of Aqaba. If, unhappily, Egypt does hereafter violate the Armistice Agreement or other international obligations, then this should be dealt with firmly by the society of nations.

And a few days later, when the Israelis agreed to withdraw, President Eisenhower sent a message to Prime Minister David Ben Gurion to the effect that—

> Israel will have no cause for regret having thus conformed to the strong sentiment of the world community. * * * It has always been the view of this Government that after the withdrawal there would be a united effort by all the nations to bring about conditions more stable, more tranquil and more conducive to the general welfare than those which existed heretofore.

In reliance on these assurances, Israel's Government withdrew its forces and for the next 2 years there was a measure of serenity on the Israel-Egypt frontier. Israel's own ships passed through the Straits of Tiran, opening up that country's trade with Asia and Africa, and Israel's cargoes were permitted to transit the Suez Canal—though not Israel's shipping.

But this state of comparative calm came to an end early this year. After permitting some 40 ships to pass through the Suez Canal carrying cargoes to and from Israel, President Nasser suddenly halted two ships in the canal in the spring of this year. In both cases, cargoes either to or from Israel were seized. A few weeks later a Greek ship was allowed to pass, but on May 21 Egyptian authorities halted the Inge Toft, a Danish freighter, as it attempted to carry an Israel cargo of cement, potash, and other goods to Hong Kong, Manila, and Japan. This ship is still in Port Said. President Nasser will not let it pass.

Since that time and within recent weeks the Egyptians have seized mail bound for Israel from Australia from the Norwegian freighter Tarn and impounded from another Norwegian freighter Tagof, a box containing equipment and literature for the Israeli meteorological service from Australia.

All members of the United Nations, whether they be big or small, are entitled to protection from aggression, and all members of the United Nations owe an obligation to that body to help it discharge its responsibilities. We will not carry out our responsibilities to meet and solve the problem of the Suez Canal by an airy reference of the issue to Mr. Hammarskjold or the United Nations. The U.N. is no stronger than any of its members, and we are one of the strongest. This is not an issue to be decided by asking little Israel to accept some abridgment of its rights, and by pressuring Israel to live under imposition, blockade, and siege. The premise upon which the United Arab Republic predicates its course is untenable. No member nation of the U.N. has the right to assert that it is in a state of war with its neighbors in the face of a United Nations Security Council resolution making a contrary finding. The U.N. Charter requires it to work for peace and to live in peace.

In this connection, I should like to recall two of the six principles which President Nasser accepted in 1956. They provided, first, there should be free and open transit through the canal without discrimination overt or covert; and, second, the operation of the canal should be insulated from the politics of any country.

On June 24 a group of 25 Senators joined in a telegram addressed to President Eisenhower, expressing our concern over shipping in the Suez Canal. Nine days later, on July 3, we received a reply from Assistant Secretary of State William B. Macomber, which was made public, in which we were reassured that our Government clearly and unequivocally adhered to its original position in opposition to any restrictions on the use of the Suez Canal. Secretary Macomber's letter has been inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 6.

The United Arab Republic has now requested from the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development a $40 million loan to widen and deepen the Suez Canal. There is little question that such a physical improvement of that international waterway would be of great benefit to the world and to the United States. However, to what avail is such an improvement if the canal should be operated illegally and, once improved, as a more efficient instrument against the peace wielded by the United Arab Republic?

The World Bank is a specialized agency of the United Nations. It makes its own decisions. It is independent. It decides who shall receive its loans. It is not responsible to the United Nations. But the Bank, like any responsible lender, owes some obligations to the international community by which it is sponsored. Does the World Bank propose to lend large sums to one of its stockholders to improve a waterway which is used in violation of a U.N. decision and in illegal action against other stockholders?

It is very sad to reflect that after 11 years the Arab-Israel conflict is just as far from solution as it ever was. We have not been able to bring the parties closer together. We cannot hope to bring about peace and concord between Israel and Egypt now, but we can hope to pursue a consistent policy which in this area we have already inaugurated in 1956 and 1957, and insist on respect for international law. Our policy has been often criticized for failure of consistency in its application; this is a situation in which such consistency is both practical and needed. Hence, on this step-by-step basis, we should insist now that illegal restrictions on the use of the Suez Canal must be lifted and the Inge Toft case settled; otherwise we cannot give aid or fail to protest aid proposed by other international agencies.

I would urge, therefore, that as a condition for the World Bank loan the Egyptians pledge operation of the Suez Canal in accordance with the Constantinople Convention of 1888 and subsequent international agreements providing for unrestricted access and use, and that this pledge be guaranteed by the U.N., of which the International Bank is a constituent body. The United Arab Republic is a member both of the U.N. and the International Bank.

Just as the Tripartite Pact of 1950, under which Great Britain, France, and the United States assured Israel's borders, and the U.N. Emergency Force in the Gaza strip and the Strait of Tiran has brought to an end border raids on the Egyptian border, so such a U.N. guarantee could be meaningful in terms of achieving a solution to the problem of transit through the Suez.

The third unsettling development to which I referred earlier is the question of the Arab refugees.

U.N. Secretary Dag Hammarskjold early in June published a proposal to deal with the refugee problem, wherein $1.5 to $2 billion would be expended within the next 5 years on projects that would make production jobs for the estimated 900,000 refugees in Arab countries. The Arab States have rejected the proposal, indicating that they would be satisfied with no less than repatriation of the refugees in Israel—an obvious impossibility with their final position to be taken at the impending Casablanca conference of the Arab League.

Jordan has qualified its position out of concern for the territorial problems of what was formerly Palestine, but this has not changed the basic situation. This follows a pattern in which I feel that Arab States have been most misguided in refusing to cooperate in the firm settlement of the Arab refugees, where they can be so practicably accommodated, but have insisted on keeping hundreds of thousands of the refugees in the misery of the refugee camps as a political weapon against Israel.

The U.N. General Assembly will undoubtedly have this item on its agenda this month.

The United States can do no less than be fully prepared to move for settlement of the Arab refugee problem, which has too long been one of the most critical problems in the Mideast. A resettlement plan should include worldwide action of the same nature as Europe's resettled displaced persons. Whatever may be the objections of Arab spokesmen to the proposition that the Arab refugees were made to leave what is now Israel by exhortations of the Arab armies in preparation for a triumphant return after the Jews had been pushed into the sea, the unfortunate fact is that for 10 years there has been no Arab cooperation in their resettlement and they have been used largely as a political dagger pointed at Israel. Recent reports indicate that 1,400 jobs for refugees went unfilled when exit permits were denied them by Arab host governments, host governments which have rejected also plans for extensive development programs for resettlement. Syria and Lebanon, on their part, have obliged UNWRA to transport supplies for these unfortunates by railroad rather than, less expensively, by truck.

Arab refugees constitute almost half the population in Jordan, about 517,388 being there, with 221,058 in the Gaza Strip, 102,586 in Lebanon, and 92,524 in Syria, with an annual net population increase of 25,000 to 30,000 due to a continuing high birth rate. It is clear that the problem must be settled now.

Israel has evidenced willingness to negotiate compensation for Arab properties, notwithstanding its heavy counterclaims against the Arab States, which ejected 300,000 Jews since 1948 and deprived them of their property.

The problem of land could be quickly settled by the Arab governments, particularly Iraq, which has the resources in land and water and is underpopulated, and whose new revolutionary regime we have just recognized. A major effort by the United Nations and the United States to enlist its participation could prove most fruitful at this time.

I believe that Israel will take a reasonable number of the refugees suitable for repatriation and giving consideration to the dangers to its security by any fifth column. Also, Israel has already repatriated 25,000 to 30,000 Arabs, and in reuniting Arab families and by other means, it is estimated as many as 100,000 former Arab refugees are now located in Israel.

Obviously, the resettlement of the Arab refugees is not a complete policy for the Mideast, but it does represent an initiative upon which the other elements can be built. They include:

First a clear guarantee of Mideast borders against direct or indirect aggression, preferably under U.N. auspices. This would include also the U.N. guarantee of freedom of transit through the Suez Canal.

Second. A suitably adapted and adequately financed Mideast regional economic plan based on self-help and mutual cooperation, and started with those who choose to cooperate even if this does not include all the Arab States. President Eisenhower in his August 13, 1958, address before the U.N. General Assembly, proposed the establishment of such an Arab Development Bank on a regional basis to accelerate progress in such fields as industry, agriculture, water supply, health and education. It would provide loans to the Arab States as well as the technical assistance required in the formulation of development projects, would be managed by the Arab States themselves and would serve also to attract needed private investment funds to the area as well. Such an Arab Development Bank, I believe, should not only include the Arab nations originally contemplated—United Arab Republic, Jordan, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon, Yemen, and Kuwait—but study and consideration should be given to include also such other nations as Iran, Libya, the Sudan, Tunisia, Turkey, Afghanistan, Morocco, Somalia, and Ethiopia.

Third. Broad-scale activities in person-to-person exchanges and the establishment of technical training institutes and other institutions in the Middle East.

One of the primary aspects of an initiative by the United States would be in respect of a regional economic plan for the area if this is taken up and implemented. There is every assurance that other governments will cooperate in the financing of such a plan, notably the United Kingdom, Italy, and Germany have already indicated their interest, and so has the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

It would be essential also to bring into Mideast economic development and the resettlement of the Arab refugees the oil revenues of the Mideast and the oil companies which pay them. These oil revenues aggregated $1.026 billion in 1957 and are an indispensable element of any Mideast program.

The argument is made that the Arab States might not work with us due to Arab nationalist pressure, but in efforts in regional economic development we are not confined to the Arab States alone but should include the economic region involved, leaving the problems of an economic bridge to Israel to be solved for the present through the United Nations. The leaders of these countries outside the Arab bloc have also led their peoples out of colonial status yet with acceptance of their responsibilities in the civilized world and without seeking to build personal power hegemonies.

Settlement of the Suez Canal dispute, Mr. President, is, I believe, the first great step at this time. For a guarantee of a freedom of transit through that international waterway by the United Nations would clearly stake out the interest of the world community in taking an active role in assuring peace in the strife-ridden Middle East. As a principal member of the International Bank and a leader in the United Nations, the United States can assume the leadership position in seeing that this is done.

Last week 13 members of the House Committee on Banking and Currency addressed a communication to the World Bank appealing to that body to withhold the loan for improvements to the canal until the Suez Canal is recognized as an international artery without limitations or restrictions, thus concurring with the sentiments previously expressed by Members of this body to which I have referred. The International Bank surely can do no less than this, for it has within its power, as the lender of important funds highly desired by the United Arab Republic, an instrument to help bring about that compliance with international law which we all seek. A key to the peace lies within our hands; let us grasp it.

Mr. President, I close with a word for which I hope perhaps I shall be forgiven by all Senators present. I express the hope and I make the prayer, as one new Member of this body—and I am relatively new, since this is only my third year in the Senate—that the face of the Senate which is turned to the people of the United States and to the people of the world, especially in hours which are very likely to see the adjournment of the Congress, be the best, the most constructive, the most invigorating and the finest face which we can turn to them. I hope and pray we will do our utmost to subordinate our personal desires or our personal irritations, or even our personal pet projects, bearing in mind that no matter what we debate, whether it be highways, Laos, the Mideast, or some inconsequential bill, we will not be judged on that, but we will be judged on our total overall performance, on the fact that we proceed with deep consciousness of the prestige of our country, which is on the line in this body—yes, Mr. President, tonight as never before in the great history of our country.

I hope, Mr. President, I shall be forgiven and understood for uttering these words. I am not critical of anyone concerned. I know every Senator is trying to do his best for our country and for the world. Sometimes it is helpful if we look at things in that light, bearing in mind the fact that we are not only in a fish bowl for the United States, but also in a fish bowl for the whole free world.

FEDERAL-AID HIGHWAY ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8678) to amend the Federal-Aid Highway Acts of 1956 and 1958 to make certain adjustments in the Federal-aid highway program, and for other purposes.

Mr. NEUBERGER and Mr. MORSE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I have decided to withdraw my amendment to the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] at this time, because of the technical difficulties involved in synchronizing my proposal with the language in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. I have consulted on this matter with learned legal counsel, and they feel it is not possible effectively to dovetail my proposal with that of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE].

In order that the issue before the Senate may remain as clear cut and as forthright as possible, I hope the Senate will proceed to an early vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE].

Should the Senate approve the Gore amendment, it is my understanding there will be offered another amendment, I believe by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], which will be designed to eliminate a deficit which would be created by the diversion of the automobile excise taxes from the general fund to the highway trust fund, which deficit will not be entirely made up by a repeal of the credit against income tax for dividends received by individuals.

A second amendment, which I am informed will be offered, will deal with the withholding at the source of taxes on dividends and interest, and the revenue to be realized from those items has been estimated to cover more than the general fund deficit.

If the Senate should fail to adopt the latter proposal, it is my present intention to offer again an amendment to increase, by 1 cent, the Federal tax on gasoline and other motor fuels, so as to cover the deficit.

In conclusion, I wish to say it is my opinion that not only should these tax loopholes be closed, but we should face up to our fiscal responsibilities by increasing the Federal gasoline tax 1 cent, or perhaps even 1½ cents.

Mr. GORE and Mr. JAVITS addressed the Chair.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I appreciate the generous action of the able Senator from Oregon, because this will permit the Senate to make a simple choice, a clear-cut choice. The amendment which the Senator has in mind can be more readily drafted as an additional section to the bill, rather than as an amendment to my amendment.

Mr. NEUBERGER. The Senator, I am sure, knows of my desire to cooperate with him on these very vital issues.

Mr. JAVITS and Mr. LAUSCHE addressed the Chair.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I simply want to send an amendment to the desk for printing under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the desk.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I am willing to yield the floor, unless the Senator wants to discuss what I have recently said.

Mr. MORSE and Mr. LAUSCHE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Oregon is recognized.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SITUATION, VISIT BY PREMIER KHRUSHCHEV TO THE UNITED STATES, AND SINE DIE ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I should like to have the staff notify the majority leader I am about to make some remarks in which he may be interested. I have explained to the majority whip that as soon as I got the floor in my own right I should like to have the majority leader notified.

Mr. President, I have been waiting for some hours to take the floor to discuss briefly my position in regard to the parliamentary situation which confronts the Senate. I think I owe it to the Senate and I certainly owe it to myself and to my friends to make a statement as to my position in regard to the parliamentary situation which confronts us and my part in it. I shall discuss it from the standpoint of three general topics: First, my reason as to why I do not think the Senate should adjourn sine die by September 12; second, my position in regard to the parliamentary situation in which I found myself yesterday with respect to protecting my own parliamentary rights in the Senate; third, my views in regard to what we ought to do with respect to a legislative program before we adjourn.

THE KHRUSHCHEV VISIT

One of the reasons, Mr. President, why I think the Senate should not adjourn sine die September 12 is that I think it should be in session at least for a few days after Khrushchev arrives in the United States. I am sorry, but it is my feeling—and I think there is reason to support my feeling—that one of the primary reasons for the sudden speedup in Senate business in recent days is that there is a strong movement on to avoid having the Congress in session when Khrushchev arrives in the United States. Roscoe Drummond in a column today expressed a view with which I completely agree when he said:

> Congress certainly ought not to run for cover during Mr. Khrushchev's presence in Washington by rushing to adjourn before it finishes its business.
> Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire column by Roscoe Drummond, appearing in the Washington Post this morning, be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> CONGRESS AND MR. K.—NO PRECEDENT OR PROTOCOL CALLS FOR INVITATION
> (By Roscoe Drummond)
> Before the debate gets needlessly off the rails, let's get out the facts on this question of Congress inviting Premier Khrushchev to address a joint session.
> I find a lot of people, in Government and out, who believe and strongly urge that Congress should invite Mr. Khrushchev in the conviction: (1) That the invitation is required by protocol; (2) that Congress always invites heads of government to address it; (3) that not to invite him would be discourteous discrimination.
> If you were to check these three statements true or false, what would your answer be? The truth is that they are all false.
> There are no protocol requirements whatsoever about inviting foreign dignitaries to speak before Congress—either presidents, prime ministers, kings, queens, shahs, or governors general. The initiative is with Congress. The decision is with Congress. The precedents set no pattern of policy whatsoever.
> Far from inviting all visiting chiefs of state or heads of government to address it, Congress over the past decade has extended invitations to fewer than half. I have just checked the array of the top foreign statesmen who came to the United States from 1947 through 1958. There were 88 such visits; a few came more than once but only 34 of them addressed either the House or Senate or joint session.
> The precedents are so diverse as to make nothing automatic. Just look at a few of them: The Prime Minister of France, Guy Mollet, was invited to address a joint session of Congress. The Prime Minister of Great Britain, Harold Macmillan, was only invited to address the Senate. The President of Brazil addressed Congress; the President of Chile didn't. The Queen of the Netherlands addressed Congress. The King of Greece did not.
> Certainly past practice shows no pattern of policy to be followed automatically. Then, would there be discourtesy or discrimination if Congress did not invite Premier Khrushchev?
> There is actually no legislation and no established procedure by which Congress determines whom it shall invite to address it. The chief parliamentarian of the Senate says that the custom has been for the decision to be made by the leadership. That would mean a decision by the majority and minority leaders of the House and the Speaker, and the majority and minority leaders of the Senate and the President of the Senate.
> But what happens if there is disagreement among the congressional leaders? Does the issue go to the floor of the House and Senate if there is a tie vote among the leaders or even if there is only one dissent? There is no rule and no precedent to govern this situation, but it can, I am sure, be taken for granted that there will be no invitation if any of the leaders seriously object. A harsh controversial floor debate is wanted by nobody.
> I cannot myself escape these conclusions: That neither protocol nor precedent nor courtesy requires Congress to invite Mr. Khrushchev to speak.
> That Congress certainly ought not to run for cover during Mr. Khrushchev's presence in Washington by rushing to adjourn before it finishes its business.
> That, since the Soviet Premier was invited to make a public tour of the United States and to have private talks with the President, there is no reason why the precious, prized platform of Congress should be thrust into his hands. Let's reserve that for those who believe in representative government, not give it to those who want to destroy it.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I believe that any planned congressional walkout on Khrushchev will be interpreted in many parts of the world where we are trying to win men's minds to the cause of freedom, as an affront not only against Russia, but against our own professed ideals of peace.

We claim to be searching for honorable ways of establishing permanent peace in the world. We represent to the world that we are willing to give reasoned judgment to the representations of the leaders of people of other nations such as Russia, who may lead us into war, if an acceptable basis for peace is not worked out in our time. I hold to the view that there is not much time left.

NATIONAL INTEREST SERVED BY CONGRESS REMAINING IN SESSION

Congress, along with the President, has the responsibility to help mold a program of peace through a system of world justice by law. Congress has a duty to the American people to carry out its responsibility, under the advice and consent clause of the Constitution, to help promote a better understanding with Russia and other potential enemies.

Democratic institutions are worth looking at. The American people have the right to be proud of their democratic institutions. Congress is one of the great trio of the independent branches of democratic government which help distinguish democratic self-government from a totalitarian politboro.

We should not run out on the Khrushchev visit. To the contrary, we should proceed between now and then with a regular legislative program unscarred by steamroller parliamentary pressures and tactics. Congress should recognize that the eyes of the world generally are on America because of the forthcoming Khrushchev visit.

Much is being said about Khrushchev trying to turn his visit into a Communist propaganda barnstorming of the United States. I have no doubt that Khrushchev will try to take advantage of every incident, of every interview, of every public appearance, of every demonstration of public reaction to him, in an endeavor to propagandize himself and his Communist sophistry and the Communist claims that his government is seeking peace and coexistence, but finds lack of cooperation on the part of the Western nations including especially the United States.

What I am urging is that we in Congress not run away from our opportunity and our duty to stand with the President in extending proper Congressional protocol and diplomatic responses to Khrushchev's official visit to the United States.

What are we afraid of? What are we worrying about? Does anyone think that the American people are any less able than we are to appraise whatever representations Khrushchev may make while he is in our country? I respectfully point out that we should adopt an affirmative and positive rather than a negative and defeatist attitude to Khrushchev's visit to the United States. We should demonstrate to the world that we seek an honorable peace and we should outline to Khrushchev a program for peace which will place the burden on Russia to demonstrate to the world in return that she is willing to keep faith with the professings about peace.

Mr. President, let me make it clear that I did not favor Khrushchev's visit in the form in which it is about to take place. In fact, long before the President ever extended any invitation to Khrushchev, the record is perfectly clear that time and time again I urged that the leaders of the nations of the world should meet under the canopy of the United Nations at the United Nations headquarters in New York City for a discussion of the various problems that threaten the peace of the world. Under such an arrangement Khrushchev would have come as only one of many visiting heads of state.

I believe that inevitably, if we are going to win this great battle for peace, the heads of all nations will have to get together in such an international conference under the auspices of the United Nations for a discussion of what can be done to avoid a nuclear war. It may very well be humanity's last chance to save itself. However, another course of action was followed by the President of the United States.

I suppose, Mr. President, that no one in the Senate has been more critical of the President of the United States on many issues than the senior Senator from Oregon, but when it becomes an issue of national survival, when it becomes an issue of peace or war, when it becomes an issue of standing behind the President in an hour of national crisis, the senior Senator from Oregon will yield to no man in the Senate. I believe, although I may be wrong—but my intuition tells me not—that we are approaching a decisive hour in the history of mankind. When we have such a visit as is about to take place in this country by the head of a state which we all recognize would probably be our greatest potential enemy in case of another world war, then we in Congress should be on hand, side by side, shoulder to shoulder with the President, to demonstrate the working of democracy during the visit of that head of state.

Mr. President, it is not for me to say what the form of the welcome should be so far as the official program of my Government is concerned. However, as a Member of the Senate and as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I owe it to the people of my State and of my Nation to make myself clear as to what I think Congress ought to be ready to do, provided the President of the United States and the State Department desire that kind of assistance from us during the Khrushchev visit.

I think we ought to be on the job, ready and willing to cooperate with the President in the extending of any protocol that a Congress in session can extend to the visiting head of a foreign state. It is not for the Congress to take the initiative in such matters but rather to stand ready to cooperate with whatever request the President and the State Department might make of the Congress.

I wish to point out, Mr. President, that we are going to be judged in India, in Burma, in Pakistan, in all of southeast Asia and Africa and in all the areas of the world where we are in a contest with Russia for the minds of men, by the way we keep faith with our professing of our good will, of our claimed sincerity in trying to work out a permanent and honorable peace, of our willingness to listen to ideas with which we do not agree, of our national policy of politeness, and of our friendship for the people of Russia.

I believe we also need to keep in mind that we should not play into the hands of Russian propaganda by following a congressional course of action of adjourning sine die almost on the eve of the arrival of Khrushchev. By doing so, we would provide much fodder for the Russian propaganda machine in regard to the failure or the refusal of Congress to at least be on hand when the Premier of Russia arrives. It would be represented as a symbolic insult to the people of Russia.

Mr. President, I point out that Khrushchev has welcomed many Governors of States of the United States in Moscow. I would point out that Khrushchev has laid out the so-called protocol red carpet for many American businessmen. I would point out—and I think it was very helpful to our cause because of the discussion that took place in Moscow—that the Vice President of the United States received the so-called red carpet protocol treatment from the head of the Russian state. I would point out also that a good many Senators and Representatives have availed themselves of the protocol courtesies of the Premier of Russia and other high officials of Russia when they have been in Moscow. Also let us not forget that the President of the United States will be a guest in Russia later this fall.

Mr. President, I am not passing any valued judgment on the visits of American officials and businessmen to Russia. I am only pointing out that these are facts. Therefore I do not like to see Congress put itself in a very embarrassing position by going into sine die adjournment on September 12, just before the Russian Premier arrives in the United States. If it should do so, we would probably read in the press of the countries of southeast Asia, India, and Africa that the Congress of the United States, to use the language of Mr. Drummond in his article this morning, ran for cover during Mr. Khrushchev's presence.

There are great differences among us in the Congress as to what our course of action should be. All I am saying in the Senate tonight is that we should be on hand to follow out whatever protocol ceremonies the President or the Secretary of State may call upon us to perform.

Also, as I shall show when I reach another point shortly, there is need for a longer session of the Congress to complete the legislative program which will be uncompleted if the Congress adjourns sine die on September 12.

I also point out that two dignitaries from the Soviet Union, Deputy Premier Mikoyan and Mr. Kozlov, visited us. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee met with both those representatives of the Soviet government. I happen to think it was very helpful to us. Speaking only for myself, I think it was very helpful to me to sit there during the period of questions and answers and conversation, and evaluate the nature of the men who were here representing the Soviet Union. Men in whose totalitarian hands there rests such vast power of life and death over so many millions of people in Russia, and—let us be frank about it—perhaps also in the United States.

This is a dangerous period in world history. We are not going to solve the problems of peace if we do not take every advantage that comes our way, to try to find out what it is that makes the minds of these men tick.

I think we would be in a much better position with the Congress in session, and with the Foreign Relations Committees of the two Houses of Congress, if they should decide to do so, ready to sit down in a conference with Khruschchev. Such a course of action would enable us to put to Khruschchev, as we did to Mikoyan and Kozlov, certain pertinent questions the answers to which would be helpful to us in appraising and evaluating and judging the future course of action which we should follow in our relations with Russia.

So I publicly confess that one of the reasons I am urging a slow bell, so to speak, in the adjournment of this session of Congress is that I think it is in the national interest for Congress to be in session for at least a few days after the arrival of Khrushchev. I believe that if we follow the course of action I have suggested, we shall not regret it.

There may be some acrimonious debate in Congress while Khrushchev is here. There may be some incidents. But that is democracy at work. Are we afraid of it? That is free speech, manifested in a country which practices self-government. It would be good for Khrushchev to observe these workings of democracy and to take those observations back to Russia no matter what incidents, what points of view, or what debates occur in the United States during his visit. I do not believe that we should put democracy under wraps during the period of Khrushchev's visit. I believe that the Congress of the United States, the legislative branch of the Government, along with the executive branch, should be working together during the period of this historic visit.

THE END OF THE SESSION SPEEDUP

I turn now to the second reason for the course of action I am following parliamentarywise in the Senate. I think my colleagues know that this is not the first year that I have been very much concerned about the speedup of Senate action in the dying days of a session. I learned many years ago, early in my 15 years of service in the Senate, that during the last days of a session we need to perform the services of a watchdog on legislation in the Senate, because under the rush and the pressure, under the many unanimous consent agreements, bad legislation is frequently passed.

I do not need to recall to my colleagues that the last afternoon and night of the last day of the session last year only two or three of us, under a great deal of criticism, and it is never pleasant to be in that role—followed a parliamentary course of action in the Senate which, in my judgment, stopped the passage of what was generally recognized as anti Supreme Court legislation. I am satisfied that more legislation of that nature would have been enacted if two or three of us had not taken an adamant position that we would exercise all of our parliamentary rights under the rules of the Senate.

ABUSE OF UNANIMOUS CONSENT

I resolved last year, after that experience, that, come this year, I would start earlier, and that this year I would slow up the procedures of the Senate in the last days with respect to unanimous-consent agreement. Let me say respectfully that we have almost reached the point where most pieces of legislation are offered to us on the basis of a unanimous-consent agreement to limit debate.

This is not the first time I have spoken against this approach. I doubt if any other Member of this body has objected to more unanimous-consent requests to limit debate than has the senior Senator from Oregon. I serve notice tonight that for whatever additional period of time I serve in the Senate, I shall object to many more—percentagewise—unanimous-consent agreements from the beginning of each session than I have in the past. I have become convinced that legislating through unanimous-consent agreements is not in the best interest of the Senate or of the Nation. I have become convinced that major pieces of legislation should not be passed in the Senate under unanimous-consent agreements to limit time for debate.

Time and time again colleagues have come to me, after they had become parties to a unanimous-consent agreement, and said, "I wish I had known that this particular point would arise in the debate. If I had known it, I never would have given consent because there is not enough time now to make a convincing case in opposition to it." I have heard that point of view expressed many times after the fact—a point of view which I think is right. I serve notice tonight that from now on I shall grant unanimous-consent requests to limit debate on any major issue in the Senate only upon the rarest of occasions, and only when the facts and circumstances in an individual case convince me that the public interest could not possibly be jeopardized by the agreement.

Three or four years ago, I believe, I placed in the RECORD an analysis of the history and development of unanimous-consent agreements to limit debate in the Senate. I have not had time this afternoon because of my work on the floor to locate that study and refresh my memory about it, so I must speak about it from memory.

The analysis showed that unanimous-consent agreements have become a very common procedure in recent years in the Senate. Until recent years it was a procedure that was used only rarely. I believe that the tendency to transact most business in the Senate—at least in connection with anything of major consequence—by way of unanimous-consent agreements, has been very costly to the effectiveness of the Senate as a deliberative parliamentary body.

I think it has been very costly to the purpose of debate and the exchange of ideas in the Senate. I think we are going too far away from the intention and purposes of our constitutional fathers in respect to unlimited, full, deliberate debate in the Senate. Do not tell me that if Senators sit and listen to debate, if they are actually present and hear the debate, their minds are not changed.

No one will ever convince me that at least some of the amendments offered last night by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] in connection with Public Law 480 would not have been adopted if all Senators had been on the floor of the Senate, heard the debate, and realized that many of the amendments were committee amendments, and not Humphrey amendments. Discussions I have had today lead me to believe that votes were cast last night against some amendments by Senators who thought they were voting to sustain the committee. The fact of the matter is that the Senator from Minnesota was presenting committee amendments, not Humphrey amendments, in many instances.

But what happens when a unanimous-consent agreement is entered to limit time? We all know what happens. The few who are engaged in debate speak to an almost empty Senate Chamber.

A unanimous-consent agreement to limit debate has resulted in the common practice in the Senate of Senators not attending debate, once the agreement has been entered into. Then if an agreement is entered to vote at a time certain—say a time certain to vote next Wednesday at 2 o'clock—we all know what happens. Senators not only leave the Chamber, but they go elsewhere, far removed from the Senate in many instances. I do not think that is good for the Senate. I do not think it is in keeping with the history and purpose of debate in the Senate. I think the entering into unanimous-consent agreements to limit the time for debate, and sometimes to fix a time certain to vote, has reached the point of abuse.

I have the power, as do other Senators under the rules, until they are changed, to carry out what I think is my duty in regard to that practice. It is only fair to Senators to say so. They can pass any value judgment on it they wish. It is only fair to them to know that this is my view, and that I am giving notice as to what my position will be.

INTENTION TO APPLY SENATE RULES

Some very dear and close friends in the Senate have pleaded with me to change my course of action. They have pleaded with me out of sincerity and friendship, and I think deep affection, to retreat from my position on the ground that they thought my course of action is offending many of my colleagues, and stirring up animosity against me in the Senate, neither of which I like, both of which I wish I could avoid. But my reply to them has been that I have made a study of this practice, and I am satisfied that this is my duty, so long as I sit here. If carrying out my duty means the loss of friendship and the stirring up of animosities, then I will pay that penalty rather than follow a course of inaction because I lacked the courage to do what I thought was right.

So I repeat: I think the unanimous-consent agreement method of doing business in the Senate has reached the point of abuse. It is not good for the Senate. I intend to apply the rules with respect to it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MORSE. If the Senator will permit me to finish, I should like to do so. Then I will yield.

No one regrets more than I the incidents and, in some respects, misunderstandings which led to the situation yesterday which caused me to proceed to exercise my rights under the rules. I made a request through the same channels through which other Senators time and time again have made similar requests. I made a request through the Secretary to the majority that the majority leader, or whoever was sitting in the majority leader's chair at any time, be notified that I wanted a quorum call before any unanimous-consent agreement was requested in connection with a proposed time limitation on any issue. Under the rules we are not entitled in this situation to a quorum call as a matter of parliamentary right, but every Senator who is within hearing of my voice knows it is common practice as a matter of Senate courtesy when the leadership is placed on notice to have a quorum call. Many times in each session of Congress a quorum call is asked for before a unanimous-consent agreement is submitted in regard to any major legislative issue.

I believe I had the right to expect a quorum call in connection with the fixing of a time limitation to consider a veto on the housing bill.

I had no intention of leaving the floor of the Senate yesterday at any time, but I received a message from Mr. Jack Bell of the Associated Press asking me to step into the press room to answer a couple of questions which apparently AP subscribers elsewhere in the country, including my own State, sought to have him get from me. I sent out to him the message I could not leave the floor at that time.

Immediately a second message came back to me from Mr. Bell, saying he hoped I would do what I could to arrange to leave the floor of the Senate because it would take him only a minute or two—and it took him less than 3 minutes—to get answers to those questions.

I asked a colleague who was seated next to me at the time—and my colloquy was heard by another colleague—if he would protect me until I got back in case a unanimous-consent agreement was asked for. I was not off the floor of the Senate 3 minutes. I am not criticizing the majority leader with any bitterness for what happened. I am simply making a statement of fact as to my understanding of what happened.

I returned to the floor of the Senate within 3 minutes of the time I left to discover that a unanimous-consent agreement limiting time on the housing bill debate had been entered into. To my shocked surprise, it provided for 1 hour of debate. It was said that members of the committee were willing to accept the limitation, but members of the committee do not speak for me or any other Member of the Senate. We speak for ourselves.

Mr. President, I happen to think the veto message on the housing matter raised such an important question of policy that the discussion of it should not have been limited to 1 hour, but should have been at great length. There are many phases of the whole veto problem which have been presented by the President to Congress, and which were raised again by the housing bill veto. We ought to have had a thoroughgoing discussion of it.

A 1-hour limitation of debate agreement did not make that possible.

I came into the Senate Chamber and discovered the agreement had been entered into. It was no fault of the majority leader because he says he did not know of my notice to have a quorum call. It was no fault of the colleague who had agreed to protect my interest. The fact of the matter is that my colleague said he did not hear the majority leader offer the unanimous-consent agreement. He said the action happened so quickly that he thought the majority leader was only asking for a quorum call. He said that the majority leader did not speak loud enough to be heard throughout the Senate Chamber. I can understand how those things happen and I am critical of no one for what happened. But I am making this statement of fact to the Senate because that incident satisfied me the time had come for me to protect myself completely in regard to my procedural rights, and I made very clear to the majority leader that that was my position. If we do not like the rules in the rulebook, we can change them.

But I take it for granted that the Senate rules were written by our predecessors in the Senate to be available to any Senator who wishes to use them when, in his judgment and according to his rights, it becomes his duty, in carrying out his obligations to his constituents, to use them.

That is all I have been doing, and that is all I shall do for the duration of this session of Congress, whenever in the future I wish to resort to the rules.

By using them, I believe the Senate will be required to take time to deliberate more carefully and discuss more fully the remaining important, unsettled major issues which will have to be considered by the Senate before it adjourns sine die, whether that comes before September 12 or after that date.

Now I come to the last reason for following the course of action I am taking. I believe it is very well known.

SENATE SESSION ON LABOR DAY UNWARRANTED

I think it was a great mistake to schedule a meeting of the Senate on Labor Day.

I understand that 90 or more Senators expressed, on a poll, a preference for meeting on Labor Day. It is one thing to take a poll; it is another thing to have a group policy discussion as to whether such a course of action is wise. Very often a poll will be quite different after a discussion, as compared with the result of a poll if held in the absence of a discussion.

It is my view that it would have been very helpful if the policy committee, at least for the Members of the Senate on this side of the aisle, had met, so that those of us who had some very definite objections in regard to a meeting of the Senate on Labor Day would at least have had an opportunity to express our point of view.

I can well understand that many will not agree with me, although I wish to say that some who voted against me the other night have been fair enough to say to me they think there is some merit to the view I take.

In view of the labor bill the Senate voted for the other evening, I think it is not good psychology to hold a Senate session on Labor Day, unless we wish to devote that session to a discussion of labor problems and the history of the labor movement and the importance of the free labor movement to a strong democracy.

Knowing that the bill we passed is not going to be received with enthusiasm on Labor Day by the free men and women who belong to organized labor and will meet on Labor Day in many halls throughout the country to pay honor to that day, and in view of the fact that those meetings will be taking place, I do not think it will be good psychology for the Senate to meet on Labor Day. It will amount in a way to rubbing salt into the wounds the Congress has inflicted on labor.

But be that as it may, I felt that at least some consideration should have been given to, and there should have been more opportunity to give consideration to, the point of view of those of us who do not think the Senate should meet on Labor Day.

Let me put one ugly rumor to rest at once: This afternoon, I was told by a newspaperman that it is rumored in the Press Gallery that by having the Senate meet on Monday, the senior Senator from Oregon would lose an honorarium of $2,000, which otherwise he would have received for making a speech on that day.

In the first place, I do not know what an honorarium of that sort looks like.

In the second place, I was not planning to make an honorarium speech on that day at all. In fact, although I would have attended a labor meeting on that day, my major activity would have been complete relaxation at the Oregon State Fair. Certainly that would have been no reason for not agreeing to have the Senate meet on Monday.

I was perfectly willing to waive that activity, to conform myself to the decision to meet on Monday. But I think it was a mistake to decide to meet on Monday for the other reasons I have mentioned and will mention.

LABOR DAY SESSIONS

Mr. President, Labor Day was established in 1894. It became a national holiday in that year.

Since 1894, the Senate has been in session 19 times through Labor Day; that is to say, on 19 occasions since 1894 the sine die adjournment came after Labor Day. But since 1894 the Senate has met on Labor Day only three times.

The first time the Senate met on Labor Day was in 1913. The Labor Day meeting of that year was due to President Wilson's calling the 63d Congress into "extraordinary" session in April instead of waiting until December, when a new Congress ordinarily met. He told Congress that the 1912 election was a mandate they should act on promptly and not wait for more than a year.

The great debates of that period were on the Federal Reserve System and the Federal Trade Commission; and the great, progressive legislative program of Woodrow Wilson which was then under consideration. Of course, at that time the President had some legislative problems, too; a long session had been held, and it had been a highly controversial one. It was decided that the Senate should remain in session on that Labor Day. But the House of Representatives was not in session. Only the Senate met on Labor Day, in 1913.

In 1918, both Houses of Congress met on Labor Day. I do not believe I need point out to the Senate that at that time our Nation was in the midst of war.

In 1942, the Senate met on Labor Day again in the midst of a war.

In 1945 the Senate took a recess from August 1 to September 5; and during that time, the Labor Day holiday occurred.

So, Mr. President, by meeting on Labor Day, next Monday, we shall be acting quite contrary to the general, historic pattern of Senate conduct in regard to Labor Day. I respectfully submit that next Monday there will be no emergency that will justify a meeting of the Senate on that day. Regardless of what others may wish to point out, in my judgment no sufficient case or argument can be presented in that connection; it cannot be shown that there exists any emergency which will necessitate a meeting of the Senate on next Monday, Labor Day.

I happen to think, Mr. President, that we owe it to one of the great foundation stones of democratic self-government; namely, the free labor movement, to honor it, in the absence of a real emergency, next Monday, by standing in recess, so that this hard-working staff of the Senate and of our own offices, who, after all, belong to the ranks of labor in the real sense may enjoy that holiday. Furthermore, Members of the Senate who would like to keep some commitments in regard to honoring Labor Day should have the opportunity to do so, without the inconveniences that are going to be caused and the embarrassments that are going to be caused by our meeting next Monday.

Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE].

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, earlier in the remarks of the senior Senator from Oregon, he made the statement that he probably has brought on to himself the animosity of the Members of the Senate because he has exercised the rights which he said were his and which he believed should be exercised in the interest of good government.

If I may say so to the Senator from Oregon, I have not heard a single Senator express animosity toward him. I say that with a great deal of contentment, because it reflects the high attitude of the Members of this body not to look with contempt on the action of a Senator who is exercising his right under the rules and attempting to present to the Senate his views on important matters pending before us.

Mr. MORSE. I appreciate the comments of the Senator from Ohio. I trust that at least with the lapse of time, after which we all have a tendency to forget pain of all sorts, if there are any painful feelings toward the Senator from Oregon, time will cure them. But, contrary to what the Senator from Ohio has said, I think there is some basis for the comment I made on the basis of other evidence which has been made available to me. And I believe it bears out my comment. If I were to let that deter me, then I would have no right to sit at this desk, because I must do my duty as I see it no matter who may become resentful about it.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield with the understanding that I do not lose the floor and that the remarks of the Senator will follow mine. I am almost through, I may say to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. I want to ask the Senator some questions about that part of the Senator's remarks having to do with whether or not Congress should adjourn before the visit of Mr. Khrushchev. I do not want to intrude, if the Senator would rather have me wait until he is through.

Mr. MORSE. No. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. DODD. The Senator from Oregon referred to a column by Mr. Roscoe Drummond, published in the Washington Post of this morning. Does the Senator not agree that Mr. Drummond said, in that column, that neither protocol nor precedent nor courtesy requires Congress to invite Mr. Khrushchev to address Congress?

Mr. MORSE. I did not suggest we should, either.

Mr. DODD. It seems to me this point ought to be made clear to our colleagues. As the Senator knows, I have opposed Mr. Khrushchev's visit and an invitation to address Congress. I have never suggested we should adjourn because of this impending visit of Mr. Khrushchev.

I do not know anyone else in this body who has. So I think we ought to make clear that the objection of some of us to an invitation to Khrushchev to address Congress is based on the fact that throughout our history—and I have asked the Library of Congress to look into this—we have never before invited a tyrant or a dictator with the blood of millions on his hands to be a guest of Congress and to be afforded the ceremonial and signal honor of being a guest of Congress at a joint session. That is why some of us have been urging Congress not to tolerate an invitation to one of the worst tyrants and dictators in the world.

The second point I should like to make is that the Senator very earnestly and eloquently told us about the symbol of Labor Day. I think it is important. I do not want anything I say to be understood as anything less than that. There is an importance in symbols, and there is an importance in psychology.

I wonder if the Senator would not agree that the symbolism involved in one of the world's worst tyrants in history being invited as a guest of a free Congress is not of great significance, too?

Mr. MORSE. I shall be glad to discuss the comments which the Senator has made. First let me say to my colleague that I put in the RECORD the entire Drummond column, not just an excerpt. Second, I made very clear, as the RECORD will show, that the protocol and the reception and the procedure for handling the Khrushchev visit rests on the executive branch of this Government, particularly the President and the Department of State. But I said I thought we ought to be in session, ready and willing to cooperate with our President, in carrying out any protocol that the President or the Department of State might decide would be helpful in connection with the visit of this head of a foreign state. Although one can argue technically as to whether he is the head of the Government of Russia, we all know that in practical effect he is, just as the Queen of Great Britain or the President of any republic who might be visiting the United States is the head of their respective governments.

This is a difficult and delicate matter. I understand the point of view of the Senator from Connecticut, and that is one of the reasons why I said in my remarks that because there may be a discussion and a division of opinion between us or among us while Khrushchev is here, that is all to the good. I would not put free speech and open debate under a bushel. I would not conceal it. That is democracy at work. That is one of the things freedom stands for, and it is one of the lessons Khrushchev ought to take back to Moscow.

Mr. President, you cannot get away from the ugly fact that he is the head, the symbol of the Soviet Union. You cannot get away from the fact that all the difference between peace and war in our time may be dependent upon an honorable course of action we may be able, and we pray we may be able, to effectuate with the Russians.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. DODD. I am sure the Senator remembers the India visit about 3 years ago. Would the Senator not agree that about 3 years ago Mr. Khrushchev and his then confidant and companion, Mr. Bulganin, visited India as official guests of that country and were invited, and accepted the invitation to address the Indian Congress. In India they talked in terms of coexistence and peace. They were wined and dined throughout the Indian nation.

But I am sure the Senator from Oregon is as aware as I that tonight 3 years later, Communist aggressive forces are massing on the Indian border, and Communist sympathizers and Communist Party members within India are rioting in her cities.

Does the Senator have any fear of or does he suspect that the now disclosed true purposes of the Krushchev visit to India may be similar to the purposes which Mr. Khrushchev has in visiting the United States?

Mr. MORSE. I wish to say to the Senator from Connecticut, I am well aware of the Indian visit of Khrushchev and Bulganin. I am well aware of the duplicitous record which characterizes Communists generally, including heads of their State. But I refuse to blind myself to the fact that the contest which is going on for the minds of men around this world will be determined by whether or not we are able to work out an honorable program for peace with the very person who is coming to the United States at the invitation of the President of the United States as a guest at least of the executive branch of the Government, but also, I think, through the President, as a guest of the Government of the United States.

In the light of that invitation I think we will stand better as a united nation with the Congress in session, ready and willing to cooperate with the President of the United States in his very difficult situation in which he will find himself in connection with this visit, rather than to do what I think we will be doing—playing right into the hands of the Russian propagandists in Asia, Africa, and elsewhere in the world by being out of session. Thcse propagandists will say that we ran away from that visit and that we did not keep the congressional session flag of this Capitol flying, to show that the Senate and the House were in session transacting the business of the people of this country during the course of Mr. Khrushchev's visit in the United States.

Those are my views about the subject. I have one other brief subject matter I want to cover in regard to my explanation of my reasons as to why we should stay in session after September 12.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will permit me to do so, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a list of all foreign dignitaries who have been invited to address a joint session of Congress or either body. I ask my colleagues to look over the names of this list beginning with Lafayette in 1824. They will find in it no precedent for extending this honor to a Communist dictator.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. I thank the Senator from Oregon. I do not know of any Member of the Congress who has suggested that Congress should adjourn and run away because Khrushchev is coming to this country. I have taken the position that Khrushchev should not be invited to address the Congress if it is in session when he is here. I, for one, think that, if there is still work to be done, we should stay and do it, but I still take the position that Khrushchev should not be invited to address a joint session of Congress.

Two thousand years ago the greatest Peacemaker of all time said:

> Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you.

I fear, Mr. President, that we may be casting our pearls before swine and that the time may come when he will turn again and rend us. So far as I am concerned, I have only this question for those who suggest that we invite Khrushchev to address the Congress: "How spineless can we get?"

Mr. MORSE. I will say to the Senator from West Virginia, I think it is never very convincing to try to settle differences of points of view by placing spiritual truths in contest. There is also a great spiritual teaching:

> Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God.

COMMITTEE CONFERENCE WITH KHRUSHCHEV SUGGESTED

I only want to say, Mr. President, we have a task of making peace with honor. The Senator from Oregon has not suggested that Mr. Khrushchev be invited to address a joint session of Congress. The Senator from Oregon has made very clear he feels we should only cooperate with the administration in connection with its task of handling this visit.

I do not have any reason to believe, if the administration should suggest to the leadership of the Congress it would be helpful, that the suggestion would not receive very courteous consideration by the Congress in the reaching of its final decision. But I have no hesitancy in saying, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the U.S. Senate, I should like to have Khrushchev at a question-and-answer conference with the committee, as we had Mikoyan and Koslov.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may ask one more question?

Mr. MORSE. I will yield in just a minute, after I finish this thought.

I should like to see what Mr. Khrushchev would have to say in answer to the questions which would be put to him at such a conference, and I think it would be good for him. It would be good for him to see what free representatives of a free people have the right to do in a democracy, in respect to the examination of officials of Government—yes, even the officials of a foreign government who come before us for conference purposes. I think that would be a healthy thing.

What a good thing it would be in India, in southeast Asia, and in Africa to have the word go out that in Washington, D C., the Foreign Relations Committee of the U. S. Senate—and I should like to see it done in a joint committee meeting with the House—spent a period of time in discussion with Khrushchev in regard to questions of foreign policy which were of interest to the members of the committee.

Why draw the line between Mikoyan and Khrushchev? Why not go to the top?

Now, I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. I shall be very brief. I take it the Senator would agree we should not stay in session, if we have concluded our business, simply because Khrushchev is coming?

Mr. MORSE. The Senator is correct.

That leads me to the last point I will make just as soon as I finish my statistics on this issue in regard to meeting during holidays.

SENATE MEETINGS ON NATIONAL HOLIDAYS

Mr. President, as a general practice the record, as compiled for me by the Library of Congress, shows that the Senate does not customarily meet on national holidays.

We meet on Washington's Birthday, but we meet on Washington's Birthday and have done so historically primarily to pay honor to George Washington. George Washington's farewell message has been read before the Senate on Washington's birthday for years and years and years. The RECORD shows that on a few occasions on George Washington's birthday, Mr. President, some business has been transacted in the Senate, but it is seldom major business and is usually pretty much pro forma. The RECORD shows that usually following the reading of the Farewell Address the Senate adjourns or recesses.

What about the Fourth of July? The only data I have been able to get—and this has had to be done very hurriedly, Mr. President—has been data on what has happened since 1940. The Senate has met once on the Fourth of July. That was in 1952, during the Korean War, when it sat on Friday, July 4. Twice, in 1943 and 1954, July 4 fell on a Saturday, and the Senate was not in session. Twice, in 1944 and 1948, the Senate was out of session. In 1948 it adjourned sine die on June 18, and it was called back into special session by President Truman on July 17. In 1944 it recessed from June 22 to August 1.

So out of the last 19 years the Senate has been on hand 17 times on July 4, but has met only once, and that was a war year. I mention it because it was stated to me this afternoon that the Senate has met frequently on July 4. Research at the Library of Congress does not bear out that claim, and I offer it for what it is worth.

I turn now to my last reason for believing that we should not adjourn sine die on September 12.

May I say this further in response to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD]. I did not say, Mr. President, that any specific person in Congress had said we ought to adjourn sine die by September 12 because of the approaching Khrushchev visit. I said, and I repeat now, Mr. President, that it is my feeling and belief that it is a motivating reason for a rush toward adjournment. I do not think it is an expressed reason, but I think it is there and I think it is in the backs of the minds of many people. Mr. President, I think it is perfectly proper and appropriate for me to express my view that it is an influence in the matter.

I do not think we should adjourn sine die September 12. I do not think we ought now, in the closing days of this session, to try to rush through, without full deliberation and careful consideration, the proposed legislation which is scheduled for consideration between now and September 12.

UNRESOLVED ISSUES STILL PENDING

There are many pieces of proposed legislation that I think ought to have very careful consideration and that we are never going to get to if we adjourn sine die on September 12. Let me mention one or two.

One that is always highly controversial, one that is a hot issue, one that will take a considerable amount of time and debate and deliberation is civil rights legislation, about which we are very much divided among ourselves.

The fact still is we are one branch of a legislative body representing the interests of the American people. The issue of civil rights legislation is a national issue, and there are many of us here who believe that the people of the country are expecting us to act upon some civil rights legislation, one way or another. For example, I just received today a communication from a group of people very much interested in civil rights legislation, calling themselves the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. Without taking the time to read it, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be incorporated at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE ON CIVIL RIGHTS,
New York, N.Y., September 3, 1959.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: It is a tragic thing that at this late date, on the eve of adjournment of the present session, the Senate has not yet had an opportunity to pass meaningful civil rights legislation. Like a broken record the same theme has been played again and again. The Constitutional Rights Subcommittee has voted out a bill, albeit woefully inadequate, after extensive hearings, and thereupon the filibuster in the full Judiciary Committee has been going strong.

In light of this situation, we welcome the actions which have been taken to bypass the Judiciary Committee. In now appears likely that through one route of another the Senate may have the opportunity to act on civil rights legislation before it adjourns.

Because of the timing of the probable action, however, we are greatly disturbed over the possibility that the Senate might feel compelled to accept so little substantively that the final product would be a civil rights bill in name only. If the issue comes to the floor of the Senate just prior to an announced adjournment target, we urge the friends of civil rights not to be stampeded into accepting a token civil rights bill.

Although men of good will may disagree on the last details of a meaningful bill for 1959, we think that there really is no room for disagreement on the imperative need to include in any bill provisions for explicit and substantial implementation of the school desegregation decisions which have now been the law of the land for more than 5 years. The most effective provision thus far proposed towards this end is the part III which was struck from the 1957 bill. Events since then have only underlined the need for this provision giving the Attorney General authority to institute civil actions on behalf of those whose rights have been denied.

Part III is included in the amendment to S. 2391 which Senator HENNINGS has already offered to the Senate for calling up at any time and on any bill. This amendment, as a matter of fact, includes all of S. 810, the Douglas-Javits-Humphrey-Case bill. We support this amendment as the most complete and meaningful "package" of civil rights proposals and earnestly request your support for it, and, if the parliamentary situation should develop that way, against tabling it.

The newspapers have been speculating for some time now about a possible "package" which will be offered by the leadership of the Senate on both sides of the aisle. We cannot, of course, appraise a proposal which has not been unveiled. We feel compelled to state, however, that if the press reports of its probable contents are accurate, this token bill will be opposed by civil rights groups of the Nation. No other proposal, written or rumored, packaged or separate, which omits backing for the law of the land as contained in the Hennings amendment we endorse can win the backing of those seeking vindication of rights protected by the Constitution.

Regardless of the particular parliamentary situation which may develop, we call upon the friends of civil rights not to yield to adjournment jitters, to filibuster threats, to cries for party harmony, or any other excuse for doing less than is morally justified at this crucial moment in the battle for human rights.

Sincerely yours,

Roy Wilkins, Chairman, Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, and Executive Secretary, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Patrick Murphy Malin, Executive Director, American Civil Liberties Union; (Mrs.) Aretha B. McKinley, Director, American Council on Human Rights; John Slawson, Executive Vice President, American Jewish Committee; Arnold Aronson, Secretary, Leadership Conference on Civil Rights; Isaac Toubin, Executive Director, American Jewish Congress; Irving Lechliter, Executive Director, American Veterans Committee; Joseph L. Rauh, Vice Chairman for Civil Rights, Americans for Democratic Action; E. Raymond Wilson, Executive Secretary, Friends Committee on National Legislation; Mike Masaoka, Washington Representative, Japanese American Citizens League; Bernard Weitzer, National Legislative Director, Jewish War Veterans; James B. Carey, President, International Union of Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers; Francis Shane, Executive Secretary, Committee on Civil Rights, United Steelworkers of America; Walter Reuther, President, United Automobile Workers of America; Annalee Stewart, Washington Representative, Women's International League for Peace and Freedom; A. Philip Randolph, President, Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I should like to ask one question. Does the Senator know whether or not the President or the head of any executive department has requested of the leadership of the Senate or the House to invite Mr. Khrushchev before Congress?

Mr. MORSE. No; I do not know. I have expressed my full view in my speech in regard to it. I do not know what the plans are for the handling of the Khrushchev visit.

Mr. President, going back to my point in regard to civil rights legislation, I believe we ought to stay on the job until we have passed some needed civil rights legislation.

Mr. President, I think I have a right to speak on this matter because I happen to be the only northern Democrat who voted against civil rights legislation in 1957. I voted against it because in my judgment the bill in the form it came to us at that time was not acceptable. I did not think it was good enough. It was not because I was not for civil rights legislation, but I did not think the bill of 1957 was effective civil rights legislation.

I have always taken the position, Mr. President, that an unfinished job remains in the field of civil rights legislation. Many of my colleagues who voted for the legislation in 1957 are my witnesses that they too think there is still a job to be done. It ought to be done this year and, may I say quite frankly, I believe it ought to be done this year rather than next. I think it ought to be done in 1959 for many reasons: First, because of the merits of the issue itself, because of the need of giving full civil rights protection to all Americans irrespective of the color of their skin or their religious faith or race. It ought to be done in the second place before the 1960 party conventions are split by this issue.

Mr. President, that raises a very important question for debate. I do not believe we ought to run out on that either. I believe we ought to stay here for a full debate on an adequate piece of civil rights legislation and get this issue behind us before the 1960 elections.

Next, I think we ought to come to grips with education legislation. Mr. President, we ought to have a Federal aid to education bill that goes far beyond school construction. However, I have little hope, if we adjourn sine die on September 12, that we will even have a school construction bill that is more than a label.

The Senate has heard me to the point of boredom, I am sure, on the need for Federal aid to education. The problem is still with us, and I think it is apropos to urge action on it before we adjourn when we take a look at what Russia is doing in the field of education.

What I am proposing is that we come to grips with the educational program from the standpoint of teachers' salaries, classroom facilities, scholarships, aid for brilliant students, and aid to the communities that cannot at the present time support an adequate school system. We need a Federal aid to education program that will give to the boys and girls an equal break and a chance to go to college. We know from the experience we had with the GI bill in the field of education what it means to the Nation economically to train minds to their maximum potentiality. In our hearings on education legislation this year the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], did able work in our labor committee on the so-called Youth Conservation Corps, and also has been of great assistance to us on educational matters. I can cite him as my witness, as I can the Senator from Alabama, the chairman of my committee, concerning the testimony as to increased tax dollars flowing to the Treasury of the United States through benefits we gave GI's so they could go to college. There was a great increase in national wealth because we developed the brainpower of those GI's who would never have had a college education except for that training. They were able to earn larger incomes on which to pay taxes because of their educational training. It is only an example, Mr. President, of what could happen to the whole potential student population of this country if we were to come to grips with this educational program.

Jefferson said democracy cannot be stronger than the enlightenment of its people. I know of no better way to keep a people enlightened than to provide our people with educational opportunities so that they have a chance to develop to the maximum their intellectual potential.

The testimony before us is that thousands upon thousands of American boys and girls are denied a college education today because of no fault of their own. They go to grade schools and high schools so low in standards that they cannot qualify for college.

So I say, rightly or wrongly, irrespective of the point of view of others on the merits of the issue, it is an issue which the American people are entitled to have decided in this session of Congress before adjournment. If it means sitting until Christmas to do it, I am for sitting in session that long.

We still have great unsettled problems in the field of taxation with which we have not come to grips, in my judgment, in this session of Congress. I think it is still true that one of the best ways to demonstrate that we believe in the principle of uniform justice in this country is by means of a tax structure that is truly based upon the principle of ability to pay. This means that there must be a great revision of the administration's tax program, which the Congress mistakenly enacted in 1954. It means that we must come to grips with some new tax problems which have arisen since 1954.

In my judgment we also have a great deal of unfinished business, as was demonstrated on the floor of the Senate last night, in the whole field of agricultural legislation. We cannot run away from the farm problem, because it will follow us. It will follow us back to the States and the voters precincts, I say most respectfully to my colleagues, when they get back home.

There was much bold talk some months ago as to what was to be done about farm legislation. In my judgment the record is an unsatisfactory one today, and we should stay to finish it.

Area redevelopment legislation to give greater help to distressed areas should be enacted. We have a tremendous job to do in that field.

I could continue with a rather lengthy list of what I consider to be vital items of legislation, which should be acted upon before we adjourn sine die, because I believe that is our duty. I feel that we should not adjourn on September 12. As I intimated earlier, and as I wish to say specifically now, I do not believe the coincidence of September 12 as a proposal for adjournment sine die, and the visit of Khrushchev a few days thereafter, is a coincidence we ought to let come to pass.

For all these reason I most respectfully say that it will be my parliamentary course of action between now and the time Congress adjourns sine die to exercise my judgment and to act in accordance with my parliamentary rights in respect to applying the rules of the Senate to the business of the Senate.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. I applaud the noble objectives expressed by the distinguished Senator from Oregon. Does he think we can accomplish those objectives most expeditiously and effectively with the harassment of having the Journal read for 2½ hours, consuming valuable time which could be devoted to the other measures enumerated by the distinguished Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MORSE. I think it would have been very interesting——

Mr. PASTORE. It might be interesting, but it is not effective. It is consuming valuable time which should be devoted to other matters.

Mr. MORSE. I intend to answer the Senator's question. I do not intend to allow him to answer it for me.

I think it would have been very interesting and very helpful to our reflective processes if we had contemplated very carefully the interesting part of the reading of the Journal today, setting forth the course of action we followed in regard to the legislation on labor which we passed. Even as one of the conferees who worked very hard in that conference, listening to the reading of the Journal today I saw newer connotations in regard to that legislation than I had previously recognized, which convinced me even more that we had made a grievous mistake. If we had listened today carefully it still might not be too late to enact some corrective legislation in this field.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the Senator outlined the Morse formula?

Mr. MORSE. I have no formula.

Mr. BUTLER. It is not that strict?

Mr. MORSE. I have no formula.

Mr. BUTLER. When will the Senator allow the Senate to adjourn?

Mr. MORSE. Under the rules of the Senate I feel that we should do a very thorough job, and a careful job, and not act under unanimous-consent agreements, which assure empty seats in the Senate. The Senate can adjourn when it votes to adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator has neglected several subjects upon which he might talk.

Mr. MORSE. I did not try to cover them all. I tried in all sincerity to present to Senators my reasons for following the parliamentary course of action I propose to follow.

Mr. BUTLER. Is this the Morse blueprint for making the world perfect?

Mr. MORSE. No.

Mr. BUTLER. Only the United States?

Mr. MORSE. The Senator is perfectly free to attach any judgment he wishes to attach to the position of the Senator from Oregon; but let me assure him, as I tried to intimate, that I am perfectly willing to permit my colleagues to form any judgments they wish, but their judgments will not deter me from insisting on applying the rules of the Senate when I think they should be applied.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. Do I correctly understand it to be the interpretation of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate is deliberately planning to adjourn by September 12, in order to avoid a situation in which Mr. Khrushchev might be asked to address a joint session of Congress?

Mr. MORSE. If the Senator from Rhode Island heard the speech of the Senator from Oregon, he will recall that in effect the Senator from Oregon said that he is satisfied that behind all this drive to adjourn September 12 is the unexpressed desire to adjourn by the time Khrushchev arrives. I believe it is a mistake to let such coincidence of dates come to pass.

Mr. PASTORE. In view of the implication leveled at the Senate by the Senator from Oregon—and I cannot speak for other Senators; I speak only for the Senator from Rhode Island—let me say that I am perfectly willing to remain here as long as necessary. I do not care whether the Congress adjourns sine die on the 12th, the 15th, the 16th, or the 17th of September. So far as I am concerned, I do not believe that Khrushchev ought to be invited to address a joint session of Congress. I do not believe it is necessary. I do not believe anyone has offered such an invitation.

I do not believe that the implication should be leveled at this branch of Congress or the other branch of Congress that we are scurrying away from Washington by September 12 because we are afraid to be here on September 13, when Khrushchev arrives. I am perfectly willing to be here on the 13th, the 16th, or the 17th. But I do not believe he should be invited.

Mr. MORSE. I have two things to say to the Senator from Rhode Island. First, the Senator from Oregon did not say that Khrushchev should be invited to address the Congress. I do not propose to permit the Senator from Rhode Island to leave that implication in the RECORD.

Mr. PASTORE. I think my ears are clear enough to hear the words uttered by the distinguished Senator from Oregon, who said that the purpose is not being expressed, but the implication is being left, that we are all rushing away by September 12 because we are afraid to be here on the 15th. The junior Senator from Rhode Island is not afraid to be here on the 15th, the 16th, or the 17th.

Mr. MORSE. I do not know of anything the Senator from Rhode Island would be afraid of; but in view of the Senator's comments, I would place much greater confidence in his eyesight, after he reads the RECORD, than I would in his words, or the implications he is seeking to leave as to the remarks of the Senator from Oregon. I do not believe the Senator's eyesight will bear him out when he reads the RECORD. The RECORD will stand as spoken.

I wish to make it very clear that I do not believe we should allow the coincidence of dates to occur, in view of the fact that we have so much unfinished business to do. We cannot complete the unfinished business by September 12.

The chief thing I said about September 12 was that it was generally understood that the drive is for sine die adjournment by September 12, as the Senator can see for himself if he reads the newspapers.

Mr. PASTORE. I quite understand that. As a matter of fact, that has been said; but I have not heard anyone else say that the date of September 12 was connected for any reason to the coming of Khrushchev to the United States.

I realize that about this time of the year it is quite natural to look forward to the adjournment of Congress. At other times Congress has adjourned sine die in the latter part of August. On a number of occasions it has remained in session during September and October.

I realize that there is much important business to be considered. I regret very much that there have been times when the Senate has convened at 12 o'clock and has recessed or adjourned by 5 o'clock in the afternoon. We did that only last week. But I say to the distinguished Senator from Oregon that the distinguished majority leader [Mr. JOHNSON of Texas] canvassed the entire membership of the Senate a week or so ago. I was one of those who were asked if they would be willing to give up this weekend with their families and friends, to remain here and do the important work that had to be done, both, today and on Labor Day. I did not consider that an affront to the labor movement of the country. I did not consider that as relating to the so-called labor legislation which was enacted a few days ago.

I took that to mean that we had important work to do, and that we should stay here and do it, even to the point of giving up a holiday or a weekend vacation. We were asked to do that. I understand the majority of Senators expressed their opinion to the distinguished majority leader, and that predicated upon that expression he decided that the Senate would be in session on Saturday and on Monday.

I do not know why the majority leader has to be punished. I do not know why he has to be chastized. I do not know why he has to be called a dictator. I do not think he has to be called any of those names at all. I think he has tried to do his work as best he can, for the benefit of the entire membership of the Senate.

I may say to the distinguished Senator from Oregon—and he may deny it if it is untrue—that I believe there have been times when the distinguished Senator from Oregon has asked the distinguished majority leader if he would not let a vote be postponed or if he would not ask for a unanimous consent agreement so that the Senator from Oregon might be accommodated on one occasion or another. I know that he has been very solicitous for the welfare of all of us. I think he has behaved himself in that regard. To go out and look at the news ticker and see the majority leader called what might be termed unkind, to use even a kind word—unkind names, is going too far, in the humble judgment of the junior Senator from Rhode Island.

To be frank, I have the highest regard, respect, and affection for the senior Senator from Oregon, and he knows it. I think what he did was rather ungenerous on his behalf. I take personal offense at it, because of my own friendship for both of the personalities involved. I do not think it did the country any good. I do not think it did the Senate any good. I do not think it is doing any of us any good, in doing the work which has to be done, as the senior Senator from Oregon pointed out only a short while ago.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I shall be glad to reply to the Senator from Rhode Island. In my speech on this matter, I think I spoke with great fairness, restraint, and regret about any differences I have with the majority leader. I have great differences with him in regard to the parliamentary course of action which he follows toward the Senator from Oregon. I did not believe, and I still do not believe, that that was a matter for me to discuss here in public debate, although I should like to say that there was a time in the history of this body when the Senator from Texas became the majority leader because of the position taken by the senior Senator from Oregon. That is a point which, sometimes, I think some of my Democratic colleagues, when they engage in their criticisms of the senior Senator from Oregon, overlook. The matter of the exchange of cooperation and courtesy is a two-way street. I know of no one on this side of the aisle who has any better record of cooperating with the majority leader. I never have refused to put myself out in granting concessions and cooperation to the majority leader. Time after time after time, month after month, I have been perfectly willing to cooperate by delaying making any comments on the floor of the Senate until the rest of the Senators had gone home. I did this to accommodate Senators, including the majority leader, when I still felt a record had to be made. If Senators think that was helpful in my public relations, they are quite mistaken.

Mr. PASTORE rose.

Mr. MORSE. I am going to finish answering the Senator from Rhode Island; then he can reply.

If Senators think that for me to postpone making speeches until after Senators had left the Chamber was very helpful in my public relations, they are wrong. But those things do not bother me.

I have some great differences with the majority leader. But he and I will thrash them out. However, the so-called tickertape bulletin, to which the Senator from Rhode Island refers, was an accurate description of the treatment I had received. I still stand on it. I do not think any good purpose will be served by the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Oregon engaging in a discussion of some Democratic Party family problems which, I say most respectfully, I think ought to be discussed in a Democratic caucus or before the Democratic policy committee.

Mr. PASTORE. That may be so. All of us have very intimate family considerations. Most of us have been compelled to come here on this long Saturday. We were here until late last night. None of us are complaining, because if our duty commands us to be here, we are perfectly willing to come back. I will be willing to come back on the Sabbath Day if it is in conformity with the tradition of the Senate, if important work needs to be done. I will foresake every other important consideration to be here to do my work. Most of us have arranged to give up our holiday.

It is awfully exasperating as I believe the Senator from Oregon will agree, to insist that, under the rule, the Journal be read for 3 or 4 hours, when important business has to be transacted, merely for the sake of delaying; merely for the sake of harassing the entire Senate.

I realize the Senator from Oregon may have reasons of his own, but when his action extends beyond that and affects every other Member of the Senate, and when it reaches out and touches the activities of 99 other Members of the Senate, then I say that a man ought to ask himself this question: "Am I God?"

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Rhode Island that the Senator from Oregon does not play God, nor does he make the kind of implied insulting remark to a colleague which the Senator from Rhode Island has just made.

I will tell the Senator from Rhode Island what the Senator from Oregon intends to do, contrary to his false statement that the Senator from Oregon would seek to harass the Senate. I intend to apply the rules on the books of the Senate, to which the Senator from Rhode Island is a party, until those rules are repealed. I think I should exercise my rights under them, and I am going to exercise them.

If it does not please the Senator from Rhode Island, I am sorry, but the Senator from Rhode Island has just finished demonstrating how wrong the impression of the Senator from Ohio was, as expressed a few minutes ago on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

CIVIL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY—AMENDMENT TO AGREEMENT FOR COOPERATION WITH GOVERNMENT OF ISRAEL

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, pursuant to section 123c of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, the following documents were submitted to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy on August 21, 1959: First, an amendment to the agreement for cooperation with the Government of Israel; second, a letter from the Atomic Energy Commission to the President recommending approval of the proposed amendment; and, third, a letter from the President, dated August 3, 1959, to the Atomic Energy Commission approving the amendment, containing his determination that its performance will promote and will not constitute an unreasonable risk to the common defense and security, and his authorization to execute the proposed amendment.

This amendment clarifies the responsibilities assumed by the parties with respect to information or data transferred pursuant to the agreement. It provides that the Atomic Energy Commission may sell or lease a net amount of 10 kilograms of uranium enriched up to 20 percent in the isotope U^{235} for use in research reactors and, at the Commission's discretion, may make all or a portion of the 10 kilograms available as material enriched up to 90 percent for use in research reactors, materials testing reactors, and reactor experiments. Provision is made regarding the responsibilities arising out of the handling or use of atomic energy materials transferred pursuant to the agreement and for the reprocessing of source or special nuclear material by the Commission facilities or in facilities acceptable to the Commission.

A new provision is incorporated in the amendment permitting the transfer of quantities of special nuclear materials, on an as may be agreed basis, for defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy other than fueling reactors and reactor experiments.

Several provisions are incorporated to minimize the possibility that material or equipment transferred under the agreement will be diverted to nonpeaceful purposes. The parties affirm their common interest in the International Atomic Energy Agency and agree to consult with each other to determine in what respects, if any, they desire to modify the provisions of the agreement for cooperation in view of the establishment of the agency.

The amendment will enter into force when the two governments have exchanged written modifications that their respective statutory and constitutional requirements have been fulfilled.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these documents be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the documents were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 3, 1959.

The Honorable JOHN A. MCCONE,
Chairman, Atomic Energy Commission,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MCCONE: Under date of July 29, 1959, you informed me that the Atomic Energy Commission has recommended that I approve the proposed amendment to the Agreement for Cooperation Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Israel Concerning Civil Uses of Atomic Energy, determine that its performance will promote and will not constitute an unreasonable risk to the common defense and security, and authorize its execution. The amendment would modify the agreement for cooperation signed by the Government of the United States and the Government of Israel on July 12, 1955.

Among other things, the amendment provides that the Commission may sell or lease, as may be agreed, a net amount of 10 kilograms of uranium enriched up to 20 percent in the isotope U^{235}, except as noted below, for use in research reactors, materials testing reactors and reactor experiments. The Commission, at its discretion, may make all or a portion of the 10 kilograms available as material enriched up to 90 percent for use in the foregoing facilities, each capable of operating with a fuel load not to exceed 8 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium. It is also provided that when any source or special nuclear material received from the United States requires reprocessing, such reprocessing will be performed either in Commission facilities or in facilities acceptable to the Commission.

The quantity of uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} transferred to the Government of Israel for use as fuel in reactors will not at any time be in excess of the amount of material necessary for the full loading of each defined reactor project plus such additional quantity as, in the opinion of the Commission, is necessary to permit the efficient and continuous operation of the reactor or reactors while replaced fuel is radioactively cooling or in transit or, subject to Commission approval, is being reprocessed in Israel.

The amendment further permits the transfer of quantities of special nuclear materials, including U^{235}, U^{233}, and plutonium, on an as-may-be-agreed basis, for defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy other than fueling reactors and reactor experiments. It also incorporates provisions clarifying the responsibilities of the parties with respect to atomic energy materials, or information, or data, transferred pursuant to the agreement.

The amendment also contains several provisions which are designed to minimize the possibility that material or equipment transferred under the agreement will be diverted to nonpeaceful purposes. Finally, the amendment contains a provision whereby the parties affirm their common interests in the International Atomic Energy Agency and agree to consult with each other to determine in what respects, if any, they desire to modify the provisions of the agreement for cooperation in view of the establishment of the Agency.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, and upon the recommendation of the Atomic Energy Commission, I hereby (1) determine that the performance of the proposed amendment will promote and will not constitute an unreasonable risk to the common defense and security of the United States; (2) approve the proposed amendment to the agreement for cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Israel enclosed with your letter of July 29, 1959; and (3) authorize the execution of the proposed amendment for the Government of the United States of America by appropriate authorities of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of State.

Sincerely,

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

U.S. ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Atomic Energy Commission recommends that you approve the enclosed proposed "Amendment to the Agreement for Cooperation Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Israel Concerning Civil Uses of Atomic Energy," determine that its performance will promote and will not constitute an unreasonable risk to the common defense and security, and authorize its execution. The Department of State supports the Commission's recommendation.

The amendment, which has been negotiated by the Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of State pursuant to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, would modify the agreement for cooperation signed by the Government of the United States and the Government of Israel on July 12, 1955. Major features of the amendment are summarized below.

Article I of the amendment includes a new provision clarifying the responsibilities assumed by the parties with respect to information or data transferred pursuant to the agreement.

The existing agreement provides that the Commission will lease to the Government of Israel, as fuel for research reactors, up to 6 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium enriched up to a maximum of 20 percent U^{235}, plus such additional quantity as, in the opinion of the Commission, is necessary to permit the efficient and continuous use of the reactor involved. Article II of the amendment provides that the Commission may sell or lease, as may be agreed, a net amount of 10 kilograms of uranium enriched up to 20 percent in the isotope U^{235}, except as noted below, for use in research reactors, materials testing reactors, and reactor experiments. The Commission, at its discretion, may make all or a portion of the 10 kilograms available as material enriched up to 90 percent for use in the foregoing facilities, each capable of operating with a fuel load not to exceed 8 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium. In addition, article II provides that when any source or special nuclear material received from the United States requires reprocessing, such reprocessing will be performed either in Commission facilities or in facilities acceptable to the Commission. Article II also contains a provision (par. H) clarifying the responsibilities assumed by the parties with respect to liability for any causes arising out of the handling or use of atomic energy materials, including source of special nuclear material, transferred pursuant to the agreement.

The quantity of uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} transferred to the Government of Israel for use as fuel in reactors will not at any time be in excess of the amount of material necessary for the full loading of each defined reactor project plus such additional quantity as, in the opinion of the Commission, is necessary to permit the efficient and continuous operation of the reactor or reactors while replaced fuel is radioactively cooling or in transit, or, subject to Commission approval, is being reprocessed in Israel.

Article III of the amendment incorporates a new provision permitting the transfer of quantities of special nuclear materials, including U^{235}, U^{233}, and plutonium, on an as-may-be-agreed basis, for defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy other than fueling reactors and reactor experiments.

Article IV of the amendment incorporates several provisions which are designed to minimize the possibility that material or equipment transferred under the agreement will be diverted to nonpeaceful purposes.

In article V of the amendment the parties affirm their common interest in the International Atomic Energy Agency and agree to consult with each other to determine in what respects, if any, they desire to modify the provisions of the agreement for cooperation in view of the establishment of the Agency.

Following your approval and subject to the authorization requested, the amendment will be formally executed by the appropriate authorities of the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Israel and placed before the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy in compliance with section 123c of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended.

Respectfully,

———— ————,
Chairman.

(Enclosure: Amendment to agreement for cooperation with Israel.)

AMENDMENT TO AGREEMENT FOR COOPERATION BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE GOVERNMENT OF ISRAEL CONCERNING CIVIL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

The Government of the United States of America and the Government of Israel, desiring to amend the Agreement for Cooperation Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Israel Concerning Civil Uses of Atomic Energy, signed at Washington on July 12, 1955 (hereinafter referred to as the "Agreement for Cooperation"), agree as follows:

ARTICLE I

Article I of the Agreement for Cooperation is amended to read as follows:

"A. Subject to the limitations of Article V, the Parties hereto will exchange information in the following fields:

"1. Design, construction and operation of research reactors and their use as research, development, and engineering tools and in medical therapy.

"2. Health and safety problems related to the operation and use of research reactors.

"3. The use of radioactive isotopes in physical and biological research, medical therapy, agriculture, and industry.

"B. The application or use of any information or data of any kind whatsoever, including design drawings and specifications, exchanged under this Agreement shall be the responsibility of the Party which receives and uses such information or data, and it is understood that the other cooperating Party does not warrant the accuracy, completeness, or suitability of such information or data for any particular use or application."

ARTICLE II

Article II of the Agreement for Cooperation is amended to read as follows:

"A. The Commission will sell or lease, as may be agreed, to the Government of Israel, uranium enriched up to 20 percent in the isotope U^{235}, except as otherwise provided in paragraph C of this Article, in such quantities as may be agreed, in accordance with the terms, conditions, and delivery schedules set forth in contracts, for fueling defined research reactors, materials testing reactors, and reactor experiments which the Government of Israel, in consultation with the Commission, decides to construct or authorize private organizations to construct and which are constructed in Israel and as required in experiments related thereto; provided, however, that the net amount of any uranium sold or leased under this Article during the period of this Agreement shall not at any time exceed 10 kilograms of the isotope U^{235} contained in such uranium. This net amount shall be the gross quantity of such contained U^{235} in uranium sold or leased to the Government of Israel during the period of this Agreement less the quantity of such contained U^{235} in recoverable uranium which has been resold or otherwise returned to the Government of the United States of America during the period of this Agreement or transferred to any other nation or international organization with the approval of the Government of the United States of America.

"B. Within the limitations contained in paragraph A of this Article, the quantity of uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} transferred by the Commission under this Article and in the custody of the Government of Israel shall not at any time be in excess of the quantity necessary for the full loading of each defined reactor project which the Government of Israel or persons under its jurisdiction construct and fuel with uranium received from the United States of America, as provided herein, plus such additional quantity as, in the opinion of the Commission, is necessary to permit the efficient and continuous operation of such reactors or reactor experiments while replaced fuel is radioactively cooling, is in transit, or, subject to the provisions of paragraph E of this Article, is being reprocessed in Israel, it being the intent of the Commission to make possible the maximum usefulness of the material so transferred.

"C. The Commission may, upon request and in its discretion, make all or a portion of the foregoing special nuclear material available as uranium enriched up to 90 percent in the isotope U^{235} for use in research reactors, materials testing reactors, and reactor experiments, each capable of operating with a fuel load not to exceed 8 kilograms of the isotope U^{235} contained in such uranium.

"D. It is understood and agreed that although the Government of Israel may distribute uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} to authorized users in Israel, the Government of Israel will retain title to any uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} which is purchased from the Commission at least until such time as private users in the United States of America are permitted to acquire title in the United States of America to uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235}.

"E. It is agreed that when any source or special nuclear material received from the United States of America requires reprocessing, such reprocessing shall be performed at the discretion of the Commission in either Commission facilities or facilities acceptable to the Commission, on terms and conditions to be later agreed; and it is understood, except as may be otherwise agreed, that the form and content of any irradiated fuel shall not be altered after its removal from the reactor and prior to delivery to the Commission or the facilities acceptable to the Commission for reprocessing.

"F. Special nuclear material produced in any part of fuel leased hereunder as a result of irradiation processes shall be for the account of the Government of Israel and after reprocessing as provided in paragraph E of this Article, shall be returned to the Government of Israel, at which time title to such material shall be transferred to that Government, unless the Government of the United States of America shall exercise the option, which is hereby granted, to retain, with appropriate credit to the Government of Israel, any such special nuclear material which is in excess of the needs of Israel for such material in its program for the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

"G. With respect to any special nuclear material not subject to the option referred to in paragraph F of this Article and produced in reactors fueled with material obtained from the United States of America which is in excess of the need of Israel for such material in its program for the peaceful uses of atomic energy, the Government of the United States of America shall have and is hereby granted (a) a first option to purchase such material at prices then prevailing in the United States of America for special nuclear material produced in reactors which are fueled pursuant to the terms of an agreement for cooperation with the Government of the United States of America, and (b) the right to approve the transfer of such material to any other nation or international organization in the event the option to purchase is not exercised.

"H. Some atomic energy materials which the Commission may provide in accordance with this Agreement are harmful to persons and property unless handled and used carefully. After delivery of such materials to the Government of Israel the Government of Israel shall bear all responsibility, in so far as the Government of the United States of America is concerned, for the safe handling and use of such materials. With respect to any source or special nuclear material which the Commission may, pursuant to this Agreement, lease to the Government of Israel or to any private individual or private organization under its jurisdiction, the Government of Israel shall indemnify and save harmless the Government of the United States of America against any and all liability (including third party liability) for any cause whatsoever arising out of the production or fabrication, the ownership, the lease, and the possession and use of such source or special nuclear material after delivery by the Commission to the Government of Israel or to any authorized private individual or private organization under its jurisdiction."

ARTICLE III

Article III of the Agreement for Cooperation is amended to read as follows:

"A. Subject to the availability of supply and as may be mutually agreed, the Commission will sell or lease, through such means as it deems appropriate, to the Government of Israel or authorized persons under its jurisdiction such reactor materials, other than special nuclear materials, as are not obtainable on the commercial market and which are required in the construction and operation of research reactors in Israel. The sale or lease of these materials shall be on such terms as may be agreed.

"B. Materials of interest in connection with defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy and under the limitations set forth in Article V, including source materials, special nuclear materials, byproduct materials, other radioisotopes, and stable isotopes, will be sold or otherwise transferred to the Government of Israel by the Commission for research purposes other than fueling reactors and reactor experiments in such quantities and under such terms and conditions as may be agreed when such materials are not available commercially."

ARTICLE IV

Article VI of the Agreement for Cooperation is amended to read as follows:

"A. The Government of the United States of America and the Government of Israel emphasize their common interest in assuring that any material, equipment, or device made available to the Government of Israel pursuant to this Agreement shall be used solely for civil purposes.

"B. Except to the extent that the safeguards provided for in this Agreement are supplanted, as provided in Article VI bis, by safeguards of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Government of the United States of America, notwithstanding any other provisions of this Agreement, shall have the following rights:

"1. With the objective of assuring design and operation for civil purposes and permitting effective application of safeguards, to review the design of any (i) reactor, and (ii) other equipment and devices the design of which the Commission determines to be relevant to the effective application of safeguards, which are to be made available to the Government of Israel or persons under its jurisdiction by the Government of the United States of America or any person under its jurisdiction, or which are to use, fabricate, or process any of the following materials so made available: source material, special nuclear material, moderator material, or other material designated by the Commission;

"2. With respect to any source or special nuclear material made available to the Government of Israel or any person under its jurisdiction by the Government of the United States of America or any person under its jurisdiction and any source or special nuclear material utilized in, recovered from, or produced as a result of the use of any of the following materials, equipment, or devices so made available: (i) source material special nuclear material, moderator material, or other material designated by the Commission, (ii) reactors, (iii) any other equipment or device designated by the Commission as an item to be made available on the condition that the provision of this subparagraph B2 will apply, (a) to require the maintenance and production of operating records and to request and receive reports for the purpose of assisting in ensuring accountability for such material; and (b) to require that any such material in the custody of the Government of Israel or any person under its jurisdiction be subject to all of the safeguards provided for in this Article and the guaranties set forth in Article VII;

"3. To require the deposit in storage facilities designated by the Commission of any of the special nuclear material referred to in subparagraph B2 of this Article which is not currently utilized for civil purposes in Israel and which is not purchased or retained by the Government of the United States of America pursuant to Article II, paragraph F and paragraph G(a) of this Agreement, transferred pursuant to Article II, paragraph G(b) of this Agreement, or otherwise disposed of pursuant to an arrangement mutually acceptable to the Parties;

"4. To designate, after consultation with the Government of Israel, personnel who, accompanied, if either Party so requests, by personnel designated by the Government of Israel, shall have access in Israel to all places and data necessary to account for the source and special nuclear materials which are subject to subparagraph B2 of this Article to determine whether there is compliance with this Agreement and to make such independent measurements as may be deemed necessary.

"5. In the event of non-compliance with the provisions of this Article, or the guaranties set forth in Article VII, and the failure of the Government of Israel to carry out the provisions of this Article within a reasonable time, to suspend or terminate this Agreement and require the return of any materials, equipment, and devices referred to in subparagraph B2 of this Article;

"6. To consult with the Government of Israel in the matter of health and safety.

"C. The Government of Israel undertakes to facilitate the application of the safeguards provided for in this Article."

ARTICLE V

The following new Article is added directly after Article VI of the Agreement for Cooperation:

"ARTICLE VI BIS

"The Government of the United States of America and the Government of Israel affirm their common interest in the International Atomic Energy Agency and to this end:

"(a) The Parties will consult with each other, upon the request of either Party, to determine in what respects, if any, they desire to modify the provisions of this Agreement. In particular, the Parties will consult with each other to determine in what respects and to what extent they desire to arrange for the administration by the Agency of those conditions, controls, and safeguards, including those relating to health and safety standards, required by the Agency in connection with similar assistance rendered to a cooperating nation under the aegis of the Agency.

"(b) In the event the Parties do not reach a mutually satisfactory agreement following the consultation provided for in subparagraph (a) of this Article, either Party may by notification terminate this Agreement. In the event this Agreement is so terminated, the Government of Israel shall return to the Commission all source and special nuclear materials received pursuant to this Agreement and in its possession or in the possession of persons under its jurisdiction."

ARTICLE VI

This Amendment shall enter into force on the day on which each Government shall have received from the other Government written notification that it has complied with all statutory and constitutional requirements for the entry into force of such Amendment and shall remain in force for the period of the Agreement for Cooperation.

FEDERAL-AID HIGHWAY ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8678) to amend the Federal-Aid Highway Acts of 1956 and 1958 to make certain adjustments in the Federal-aid highway program, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, in 1956 Congress embarked upon the development of the Interstate Highway System. The program provided for the payment from the Federal Treasury of 90 percent of the cost of constructing 40,000 miles of high-speed, limited-access highways in America. The gasoline tax and other highway users' taxes were increased, in order to provide funds with which to complete the system.

In 1958, Congress was faced with the problem of speeding up construction of the Interstate Highway System; and, for the second time, legislation in that field was enacted. Many of the States speeded up their process of providing for the plans, the specifications, and the actual construction of the Interstate System within their borders.

Meanwhile, the cost of constructing highways rose prodigiously; and what in 1956 was contemplated as a $25 billion undertaking, is now contemplated as a $36 billion undertaking.

So far, the theory behind the construction of the Interstate Highway System has been "pay as you go."

In January of this year, it was clearly possible to demonstrate that the Federal Treasury would not have sufficient funds to permit the program to continue. So, in January, the President, in addressing the Congress, asked for a 5-year 1½-cent a gallon increase in the Federal gasoline tax.

No action was taken.

In June, a courageous Member of the Senate, the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], said Congress needed to provide the additional funds the President had requested; and the junior Senator from Oregon asked the Members of the Senate to approve an amendment which provided for a 1½-cent tax increase.

Regrettably, the Senate refused to accept his recommendation.

Meanwhile, the Members of the House of Representatives felt they should not approve any increase at all. I think it is to the infinite credit of the leadership of the House of Representatives and the great majority of the membership of the House of Representatives that only a few days ago a bill was passed providing for a 1-cent Federal highway tax increase for the next 22 months.

Here is what a prominent Member of the majority party in the House said at the time the bill was taken up. I quote from the statement of the distinguished Representative, Mr. THORNBERRY, on page 17946 of the RECORD:

All of us will agree that we never like to impose taxes. We all look forward to the day when we can reduce taxes. We cannot, under the present fiscal condition of our Government, call upon the Federal Government to continue this program at its present level without providing further necessary revenue to finance it. We must have a sound fiscal program if we are to continue to meet the highway needs of this country and to be certain that we do not cripple the economy of our Nation by causing this great program to come to a complete halt.

To which I am proud to say as a Member of Congress, "Amen."

The President of the United States said:

I must again express my objection to proposals that would, in the absence of a foreseeable budget surplus, divert receipts from the general fund of the Treasury that are collected from various excise taxes on automobiles. The transfer of these receipts to the highway trust fund would only shift the fiscal problem from the highway trust fund to the general fund, which is already in precarious balance.

The distinguished Senator from Tennessee, a member of the Finance Committee, offered the amendment now pending before us in the Finance Committee. The Finance Committee voted down his proposal, and, to its infinite credit, sent to the Senate the House bill which is before us. It is simply beyond my capacity to understand how we can justify taking money out of one pocket to try to underwrite part of the cost of a great undertaking, and that is precisely what my friend from Tennessee is trying to do in his amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. Not now. The Senator from Tennessee is going to take money which now goes into the general fund and say, "We are going to use some of this for a specific purpose."

The Secretary of the Treasury will have one more burden as the only result of that approach. He will have to borrow that much more money in order to pay the prodigious costs of the Government of the United States.

It is true that the Senator from Tennessee also asked us to repeal the 4-percent dividend exclusion. Several years ago when the subject was under debate in the Senate Chamber originally, I tried to study the background of the idea of double taxation on dividends. I went back to the days when the late great Franklin D. Roosevelt was President. I believe I remember with accuracy during his administration some of his associates suggested that double taxation was morally wrong. However, this ought not to be the place to debate that sort of proposition.

Mr. President, the pending question is and ought to be, What is the Senate going to do with respect to the interstate highway problem now? That is the question before the Senate, and I think it is completely irrelevant for my friend from Tennessee to say now, "Let us take the dividend exclusion law and wipe it out and provide that the moneys which its repeal would bring into the Treasury shall go back into the general fund." I wondered how much money that would amount to, and I asked the staff today to get a letter from the Treasury Department covering the point. I will read it. It is very short:

DEAR SENATOR: This is in response to your inquiry about the revenue effect of repealing the income tax credit for dividends received by individuals which is now provided in section 34 of the Internal Revenue Code. We estimate that repeal of the dividends-received credit would have the effect in a full year of increasing revenues by $310 million. This assumes dividends and incomes at the levels prevailing in the calendar year 1959. If the repeal were made effective July 1, 1959, and extended to June 30, 1961, it is estimated that revenues would be increased by $620 million, as follows:

By $248 million in fiscal 1960—

That is the year in which we are borrowing—

by $310 million in fiscal 1961, and by $62 million received in the fiscal year 1962.

Sincerely yours,

FRED C. SCRIBNER,
Under Secretary of the Treasury.

I believe it is fair to say that the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee would be to put back into the general fund by the repeal of the proposed dividend exclusion about half the money he takes out of it in order to provide revenues for the interstate highway construction program.

Mr. President, I am not a member of the Finance Committee. I am from a State which is interested in the construction of the Interstate Highway System. I believe I know a little something about the feelings of the people who use the Interstate Highway System and who look forward to using it more, and it seems to me they would rather have that system completed on the basis of the recommendations of the administration, on the basis of what the House of Representatives has now agreed ought to be done, and on the basis of what the Senate Finance Committee likewise agrees ought to be done. Let us continue to the greatest extent possible a pay-as-you-go basis on which this legislation will be carried forward and all the unhappy, melancholy and foreboding thoughts about inflation and the responsibilities of the Government to borrow, and borrow additional billions of dollars at least will be alleviated by men having the courage to stand up here and vote, as my Democratic friend in the House said, for an additional temporary increase in the gas tax.

I yield to the able Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. We studied the subject of the amendment in the Finance Committee very carefully. Does the Senator think the House of Representatives enjoyed voting an increase in the gasoline tax?

Mr. KUCHEL. Of course not.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the Senator think the members of the Finance Committee who voted for a 1-cent increase in the gasoline tax enjoyed so voting?

Mr. KUCHEL. Of course not.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the Senator not recognize that something must be done which will be effective in the passage of a dividend credit and the termination of that will probably not be effective in the present temper of the House? I say quite frankly I am one of those who voted to end the dividend credit. If the rollcall vote is in the Senate Chamber, it will show I voted for it, and I shall vote for it again. But I do not believe this is the place to do it, because it would place the two Houses of Congress in conflict with each other. The Senator knows the extreme difficulty with which Speaker RAYBURN was faced when he tried to put through a program which was satisfactory. It called for extraordinary efforts on his part.

If we now reverse it by the passage of this dividend credit, he undoubtedly knows that we shall be in a conference which will last a long, long time.

We have just been through a conference on labor legislation that lasted a very, very long time; and if we go on to this one, we shall be here a long time trying to straighten it out.

I am glad the able Senator from California points out that this seems to be the sensible thing to do. I do not enjoy it a bit more than he does. I have communications from the gasoline people of my State, distributors of gasoline, pleading against the 1-cent tax. I have written letters to every one of them saying, "I think you are right. We should not do it. But we have to do it to keep the road program going."

I was the first administrator of the emergency school tax in the State of New Mexico. It was passed in 1933. It was only going to last for 2 years. The emergency is still on. It is still there. There was financial difficulty. Nobody relishes the fact that it had to be done in order to keep the revenues of that State going.

This is a situation where the road program is of great importance to the States, where it is vital to the life of the States, where it is making a fine contribution to the States, where we can get into an impasse if we fail to act.

The Finance Committee took those facts into consideration. I watched the votes of the men when the roll was being called. I know how some of the individual Members felt. They were committed against an increase in taxes. They were committed in their own minds against a 1-cent tax. But they voted for the only thing that will make it possible for the bill to be passed.

If the Senate tonight accepts the alternative proposed by the able Senator from Tennessee, we shall be in a bad situation, in my opinion, because we shall be a long, long way from agreement between the two Houses.

Mr. KUCHEL. I am most grateful for what the able Senator from New Mexico has said. There, from the lips of a man who is a member of the majority, who is a distinguished member of the Finance Committee, who thus may be presumed to be an expert in this field, has been demonstrated abundantly the wisdom of the action which the committee took and which the Senate ought to follow here tonight. The people of the American Union will applaud the courage this Senate has shown if it joins the House of Representatives in approving the House-passed bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The junior Senator from Tennessee has reason to believe that if a repeal of the dividend tax credit were resubmitted to the House of Representatives at this time, the action of that body might be different from its action on a prior occasion.

The Senate has a very clear choice, that of continuing the highway program through a levy of an additional tax on every gallon of gasoline that every man, woman, or child in this country may buy, or repealing the tax favoritism now accorded income from dividends.

I should like, however, to turn to a different point. This is something I think the Senate should consider. If the Senator will be so kind as to yield, I should like to read a little of the colloquy which begins at the bottom of page 20 of the hearings held yesterday:

Senator GORE. Mr. Tallamy, your problem has two distinct parts, does it not? One, the lack of funds to meet commitments and obligations falling due within the present fiscal year?

Mr. TALLAMY. Yes, sir.

Senator GORE. And two, the making of apportionments for use and obligation of the States for future years?

Mr. TALLAMY. Yes; that is right.

Senator GORE. And each of those two major parts is subdivided, are they not, into the interstate highway program, on the one hand, and the ABC, the primary, secondary, and urban highways, on the other.

Mr. TALLAMY. That is right.

Senator GORE. I would like first to discuss problem number one, to which little reference has been made thus far.

What are the obligations falling due within the fiscal year, or the amount of obligations falling due within the present fiscal year which you are unable to meet without additional legislation or appropriation?

Mr. TALLAMY. Would you ask me that question again?

Senator GORE. What is the amount, what is the total of the obligations falling due within the present fiscal year, 1960, for which you would be in default without either additional legislation or appropriation?

Mr. TALLAMY. Divided into two parts, we require an expenditure this year of $1.11 billion for the ABC program, and $2.25 billion for the interstate program.

Senator GORE. You are giving me now the total commitments?

Mr. TALLAMY. The result of the total commitments. This is the result.

Senator GORE. The figure I am asking you for is the amount of default on the trust fund, if I must use that word, without additional legislation or appropriation, or a combination of the two.

Mr. TALLAMY. I understand: $400 million.

Is the able junior Senator from California hearing that?

Mr. KUCHEL. He is.

Mr. GORE. I continue reading:

Senator KERR. That is the deficit for the current fiscal year which you forecast?

Mr. TALLAMY. Yes, sir.

Senator GORE. I thought you had estimated it to be $493 million.

Mr. TALLAMY. $490 million is what I have on this chart. Maybe it is $493 million.

One of his aides whispered to him, and then he said:

The interest is $3 million, I am told.

Senator GORE. Then as a matter of fact, it is $493 million?

Mr. TALLAMY. Yes.

Senator GORE. Now, how much additional revenue within the fund will be provided by H.R. 8678, within the present fiscal year?

Mr. TALLAMY. $383 million. That is based on the present legislation being effective on September 1.

Senator GORE. That cannot now be a correct answer.

Mr. TALLAMY. So it will be reduced. My charts are all based on that, but it will be reduced $50 million, so it will be about $333 million.

Senator GORE. Then you have a deficit in the fund of $493 million and the bill before the committee would provide only $333 million.

Mr. TALLAMY. Yes.

Senator GORE. Then that would leave you in default to the States $190 million, would it not?

Senator KERR. $160 million.

Off the record, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] is faster with figures than any of us.

Senator GORE. $160 million.

Mr. TALLAMY. $157 million is what the deficit would be at the end of this fiscal year.

The bill before the Senate will leave the Government in default to the Senator's State, to my State, to all the States, to the extent of $157 million, plus $3 million in interest.

Mr. KUCHEL. Would the Senator approve raising the 1-cent tax to 1½ cents, as the President recommended, in order to cure that deficit?

Mr. GORE. I would not. But if the Senator is going to try to solve the problem with a gasoline tax, he could not solve it now even with a 1½-cent tax, because there are only 9 months left in this fiscal year. The administration proposed a 1½-cent tax for 12 months. There is now before the Senate a bill providing for only a 1-cent tax for 9 months. I tell the Senator it will not solve the problem either for the present fiscal year or for future apportionments.

Mr. KUCHEL. Let me say this to my friend before I ask the able Senator from New Mexico to comment on this point.

I regret that the Senator from Tennessee has had to leave the Chamber. Let the RECORD so indicate.

I merely wish to say, Mr. President, that I am sure the Senate Finance Committee did not commit an idle act. I am sure the House of Representatives did not commit an idle act.

I should like to ask my able friend from New Mexico, who is a member of the committee, to comment on the question raised by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. ANDERSON. First of all, Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Tennessee is not present in the Chamber, because I should like to say, in compliment to the Senator, that I believe he performed two very fine services during the hearing. The first of these was to focus attention on the system of contract controls which was discussed in the hearing. I think this system is completely repugnant to the desires of most States. The Senator pursued that question vigorously and valiantly. I commended him then and I commend him now.

I also commend the able Senator from Tennessee because of the fact that he developed the actual figures to show that even if the 1-cent gasoline tax increase is passed there would still be a deficit.

I also say that the Committee on Finance is supposed to use judgment, and I think the Committee on Finance did use judgment.

I hope my figures are correct, Mr. President. It was pointed out to us that by December 31, 1959, there would be a deficit in this fund of about $353 million. There is a bill which is being prepared for submission to the Congress which would permit borrowing from the general fund in order to replenish the trust fund, for a temporary period, and the money would be repaid from collections during the following 6 months.

So while a Member of the Senate might stand up on the floor to say, "All of this does not do anything, because we will have a deficit of $353 million by December 31," the situation actually is not too bad when we recognize that the collections begin to accumulate during the following few months.

Let us consider the period ending June 30, 1960. By then we will have a deficit, if I am correct, of $157 million, as the able Senator from Tennessee developed and pointed out for the first time to the committee. I commend the Senator for that, because he brought it into the RECORD.

We then asked the representatives before us what they would do about the matter. They answered, very easily, that they would allow vouchers to accumulate for about 2 or 2½ weeks, until collections could take care of them. But they did not intend to cut down on the funds for any individual State.

The Senator from Oklahoma and the junior Senator from Tennessee were two of those who pressed the witnesses very strongly on that point, as to whether they were going to use the contract controls, which the able Senator from Tennessee had developed for the first time, to cut down by the $157 million which would be in deficit. The answer came back that it was not their intention to so do. The witnesses stated they contemplated that there would be collections early in July, and that they would wait 2 or 2½ weeks for sufficient collections to accumulate to wipe out the deficit.

So the Senator from California is correct. The House did not do a futile thing. The Senate would not be doing a futile thing if it passed the bill. The legislative history is clear in the hearings on that point.

Mr. KUCHEL. Again I thank my friend, the able Senator from New Mexico, very much.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. I should like to have the Senator know that so far as the specific proposal before the Senate at the present time is concerned, a vote was taken in the Committee on Finance. The proposal failed of passage by a vote of 9 to 7. What we have before the Senate now is something which the final action of the committee, by a vote of 9 to 7, rejected in the committee. I think it is quite in order for Senators to consider this proposal as a substitute for the action which the committee itself took.

Mr. KUCHEL. I agree with my friend completely that it is in order to consider the proposal. However, I very much hope the Senate will confirm the wisdom shown not merely by the Senate Committee on Finance, but also by the membership of the House of Representatives as a whole.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not hear all the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee, but I do not think the Senator said at any point that the action taken by the House or by the Finance Committee of the Senate was futile. I believe the Senator said it was not adequate to meet the full needs of the highway program, as now projected.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thought the burden of the comments of the Senator from Tennessee—and I wrote down a little of the precise wording he used—was that what is before us tonight would not accomplish the job, would leave the States high and dry, and would not fulfill the statutory commitment of the Federal Government to give the States 90 percent of the cost of constructing the interstate mileage and system, so I interpreted the words to have the implication that what was being done so far was futile.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield to my friend from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Tennessee was completely correct in saying that approval of a 1-cent increase in the gasoline tax would not completely fill all of the pockets which might need to be filled.

Mr. KUCHEL. That is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. I assume that is the reason why the President of the United States suggested a 1½-cent increase in the tax, instead of a 1-cent increase.

Mr. KUCHEL. That is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. Unfortunately the majority of the Finance Committee and the majority of the House of Representatives do not choose to agree with the President of the United States, probably due to the fact that nearly everybody in the individual States objects to any increase in the gasoline tax at all. Therefore, the committee felt it was desirable, if there were to be an increased tax, that the increase be 1 penny instead of 1½ pennies. Nobody claims that 1 penny will do what a penny and a half will do.

Mr. KUCHEL. It is exactly that simple.

Mr. ANDERSON. However, the 1-cent increase will come very close to doing it. It will come sufficiently close to satisfy the financial requirements of the States and to fulfill the apportionments made by the highway department. That is the crucial test. The test is not whether one has all the money one wants, but whether one has enough to see him through, borrowing if he has to just a little bit for the next 2 weeks, knowing that at the end of 22 months the fund will be solvent. That is the test.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am sure the Senator from California and the Senator from New Mexico will agree that the $340 million which would be derived from the cancellation of the present dividend credit would do just as much toward financing the highway program as the $342 million which would be derived from the imposition of a 1-cent increase in the gasoline tax.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the Senator will yield, that is surely true.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this colloquy may continue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ANDERSON. I agree with that statement except that the $343 million to be derived from the repeal of the dividend credit would not be anything we could lay our hands on.

Mr. KUCHEL. It would feed the general fund.

Mr. ANDERSON. We have no way of knowing whether the House will or will not agree to that proposal. We have no way of knowing whether the President will or will not sign such a bill.

There is a possibility the President would not agree. Certainly, of all Members of the Senate I am least in a position to speak for the administration, but I have a feeling that if the Senate makes a sincere effort to meet the situation, as I think a one-cent increase in the gasoline tax would do, the bill might be signed. I have no feeling that the dividend credit repeal would pass the House or, if it succeeded in the conference, would be signed into law by the President. Quite obviously, that is not the way to cure the problem, because it would be money taken out of the general revenues designed further, perhaps, to increase problems later on. I think the result would not be of real help.

Mr. KUCHEL. The Senator is completely correct in his point.

Last month in the special message which the President sent to us he suggested that a 2-year 1-cent-per-gallon increase was a "step in the right direction." What the House has done has been to approve the 1-cent increase for 22 months, which is certainly substantial agreement with that comment on the part of the President.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield to my friend from Utah.

Mr. BENNETT. Does the Senator remember that a good many times in the last 2 or 3 years this proposal to repeal the dividend credit has been attached to different bills?

I could be mistaken, but as I remember the action, I do not think the Senate Committee on Finance has ever approved the provision. Despite that, it has come up and has been attached to one bill or another until frankly, so far as the Senator from Utah is concerned, it has become a symbol. It has become a proposal which is brought out on any occasion which will focus attention upon it.

With all due respect to my friend from Tennessee, who has done yeoman service in developing the road program, I regret very much that the Senator would even taken the slightest risk of jeopardizing the road program for the benefit of this symbol.

It seems to me also that this has become a symbol of a kind of ideological difference. The ideology on one side is that the taxation of corporations is double taxation and that the stockholders are entitled to a little relief. This is only token relief of that double taxation. But to many people in this body this little relief has become a symbol of a raid on the Treasury by Wall Street and by the rich stockholders.

I think there should be an opportunity to argue this point out in regard to a bill to amend the income tax laws. Let us have all the questions considered and go over all the ground when we are in that particular field.

To apply it as the solution of the financial needs of a program whose basic phiolosophy is user taxes seems to me to be dragging this symbol in the wrong situation, and I regret very much that my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] has taken this action to bring forward this particular proposal. It seems to me that it is another case in which the symbol is more important than the solution.

Mr. KUCHEL. I appreciate the comments of my friend from Utah, who graces the Senate Finance Committee and who has indicated once again that the problem involved in the proposed amendment is the sort of problem which ought to be heard in committee on its merits, such as they are, and should not be attached to a highway measure.

Mr. BENNETT. That is my feeling.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. McCARTHY. In defense of the Senator from Tennessee, I point out that he is not arguing that this program should not be financed through user taxes. As I understand, he said that user taxes which are now imposed upon automobiles and upon gasoline should be used to support the highway program, and what he proposes in his amendment is to transfer only a part of those funds which are now assessed on the users of the highways and to use them for highway purposes. There is no violation of that principle proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

The Senator from Utah has also made the point that this is a question of a difference in ideology. I believe that we might make some argument on that basis.

It is a question of whether we wish to impose an additional excise or sales tax on gasoline, or whether we wish to put money into the Treasury through the repeal of a provision which knocks the top off the graduated income tax scale. I shall not argue whether we are trying to tax the rich. I should like to quote figures for 1957, which show that people with under $3,000 of adjusted gross income filed over 11 million tax returns, and that only 2.1 percent of those taxpayers made a claim regarding dividend credits. The amount of tax saved for each one of these averaged $18; whereas with respect to people in the $100,000 to $150,000 income bracket, 89.3 percent of those who filed in that category saved over $1,528 per return. When we come to the class above a million dollars, 217 such returns were filed, and 95.4 percent of them claimed dividend credits, with an average saving of $38,995.

I think this is evidence as to who gains from the dividend credit provision of the income tax laws.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield to my friend, the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I point out that if we take this money from excise taxes, we help to unbalance the budget by another $300 million, which I do not believe does any favor to this country in its present situation.

When we talk about ideologies, I believe I may have offended some people yesterday or the day before by suggesting, in connection with the housing bill, that if we were in favor of houses, we should vote against classrooms, and that if we were in favor of issues, we should vote for classrooms. It was that simple. We come down to about the same thing in connection with this provision. If we are really in favor of roads, we should vote for the gasoline tax. That will provide the roads. If we are looking for an issue, we should vote for the very popular issue, which is the repeal of the dividend credit to the rich.

Actually, as many poor people use the roads as rich people. A great many of them drive daily to work. They want highways that are good. When they travel across the country, I believe very frankly that they hope to pay for good highways. Therefore, I believe, knowing what the situation is in the House and what it was with the administration, that if people really desire roads, we shall have to vote for the bill which came from the House and from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KUCHEL. That is a fine contribution, and I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, so that I may ask a question of the Senator from New Mexico before he leaves the Chamber?

Mr. KUCHEL. Yes; I ask unanimous consent that I may do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CARROLL. I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico some questions, because I have been listening to his discussion with a great deal of interest. I am not a member of the Committee on Finance. I am trying to ascertain what the facts are.

It is my impression that the 1-cent increase in the gasoline tax would yield in the next 9 months' period $333 million. Is that correct?

Mr. ANDERSON. I believe that is correct. The figure given to us was $383 million. In testimony before us Mr. Tallamy said that figure would have to be reduced $50 million because of the lateness in which it would become effective. I made the motion in the committee that this provision become effective October 1, because that is the first practical date.

Mr. CARROLL. This leads me to my second question. For the full 12-month period in 1961, this same tax would yield approximately $577 million. Is that correct?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think that is correct. I believe $580 million was the figure, but I will not argue that with the Senator.

Mr. CARROLL. In general terms.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, I believe that is absolutely right.

Mr. CARROLL. It is my impression that the money we shall need for 1961 is approximately $816 million under the present program. The distinguished Senator from New Mexico said something about phasing out this program, and this is what bothers me. Are we talking about a slowdown and a cutback under the 1-cent gasoline increase? I must have this information for my own State.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not know how the Senator could have heard me say something about phasing out the program.

Mr. CARROLL. I was under the impression that he thought 1 cent would be adequate.

Mr. ANDERSON. I did.

Mr. CARROLL. Why would it be adequate?

Mr. ANDERSON. I say to my friend from Colorado that I do not know where he got his figures. All I can do is take the figures submitted by Mr. Tallamy, which were not challenged by a single person on or off the committee, so far as I know, and which indicated that by December 31 the deficit will be somewhere in the neighborhood of $380 million, but by June 30 the deficit will be reduced to $157 million. I believe he said that could be collected in 2½ to 3 weeks in July of 1960, and that thereafter the books would balance for the 1961 fiscal year. I am not the author of those figures. I do not attempt to defend them. I only say they were not subject to challenge, even though Mr. Tallamy was under very vigorous cross-examination by many members of the committee.

Mr. CARROLL. I regret that the junior Senator from Tennessee is not in the Chamber because I think this is of vital importance. I wish to say in response to the Senator from California that the junior Senator from Tennessee had to leave the Chamber on a very important matter. But I want to press this question.

Mr. ANDERSON. May I interrupt to say that before the Senator from Colorado returned to the Chamber I pointed out that the committee was deeply indebted to the able Senator from Tennessee for developing the fact that there was proposed to us something about contract controls. That was the first I had heard of contract controls; and the Senator from Tennessee, aided by the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], vigorously cross examined not only Mr. Tallamy but the experts for the Bureau of Public Works, and I thought did a creditable job of establishing the fact that something was being proposed that we did not like. So I did nothing but commend the Senator from Tennessee. Through the questioning of the Senator from Tennessee, he developed for the first time the fact that even with a 1-cent tax we would have a deficit during the next fiscal year.

Mr. CARROLL. A deficit, as I understand, of about $160 million?

Mr. ANDERSON. $157 million. That is correct.

Mr. CARROLL. As I look to the next fiscal year, the fiscal year 1961—and this is very important to us in the West, in Colorado, New Mexico, and in fact to the whole area, to the whole country—I see in my figures a possible deficit unless the program is slowed down or stopped—I emphasize "unless"—of $399 million. This is based on the 1-cent gasoline tax. That is what I want to know about.

Mr. ANDERSON. I only say to the Senator from Colorado that nothing of that nature was submitted to the Finance Committee by anyone, so far as I know. I wonder if the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT] heard those figures. I wonder if the Senator from Kansas heard those figures. I know of no one who heard such figures. Where did they come from? Heaven only knows; but I cannot answer figures when I do not know where they come from.

Mr. CARROLL. If we really needed only a 1-cent increase, was the President wrong in asking for a cent and a half? What is the basis of the reasoning and the logic behind it?

Mr. ANDERSON. I would be happy to have the Senator from Utah answer the question.

Mr. CARROLL. I should like to have the Senator from New Mexico respond.

Mr. ANDERSON. I believe that the statements which have been made indicate why the President asked for 1½ cents. He wanted to take care of the $157 million deficit on a pay-as-you-go basis. Some of us felt that 1½ cents was a little more than the people wanted to swallow. We reduced it, and found that the lower figure would stretch. The Senator from Utah made fine contributions all the way through. He could probably answer the question much better than can the Senator from New Mexico. The President asked for a sum which he knew would be adequate. The House and Senate gave him something less than that, in the hope that it would be adequate.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, let me add this comment: The House bill has a provision which covers the problem which my friend raises. The recommendation of the administration was for a 1½-cent increase.

Mr. CARROLL. That is correct.

Mr. KUCHEL. The majority of the membership of the House, in their own wisdom, determined, as my friend from New Mexico suggested, that not more than a 1-cent increase in the tax would be needed. To compensate for the difference in revenues between what a 1-cent increase would bring, as distinguished from a 1½-cent increase, by the bill which was sent to us, the House slowed down the level of future expenditures in the system.

Mr. CARROLL. This is very important. This is what I have been trying to establish. I thank the Senator from California. From the statements of the Senator from New Mexico it is obvious that, in round terms, in the fiscal year 1960 there would be a deficit of $160 million under the 1-cent tax increase program. No one disputes that.

Mr. KUCHEL. No. What the Senator from New Mexico said is completely right. We are legislating not merely for 12 months, not merely for 2 years, but for 5 years.

What the Senator from New Mexico said, was completely accurate description of the fashion by which, during the coming 12-month period, the Federal Government will make its allocations.

I read the language on page 2, beginning in line 3:

> Subsection (b) of section 108 of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956, as amended, is amended by striking out "the additional sum of $2,500,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "the additional sum of $2,000,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961,".

It is in the second year that the cutback takes place. A year ago we were legislating a speedup in the construction program of the interstate system. There was an opportunity, it appeared to the Congress, to help the employment situation by stepping up the construction program, and that was what was done. In this instance, in the wisdom of the Congress, we cut back.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARROLL. I should like to follow through on this line.

Mr. KUCHEL. The House realistically faced today the problem of an increase in taxes, and voted for it. What is involved in the amendment of my friend from Tennessee? It means borrowing from one fund and using it in another fund. We would be manufacturing additional problems for the Treasury Department, because we would be going deeper into debt. This is more deficit financing. It is that simple.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARROLL. I should like to pursue this line if I may.

The Senator from New Mexico made it so clear that anyone who can hear can understand, that the deficit for the year 1960 is $157 million plus $3 million interest. Is that correct, I ask the Senator from New Mexico? It is exactly right.

Take the next year. I ask this question specifically. Let us not beat around the bush. Let us get down to cases. The deficit for the next year, 1961, is $399 million.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the Senator from Colorado tell us where he gets that figure?

Mr. CARROLL. The first figure I got from the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. That figure is correct. Where did the Senator get the other figure?

Mr. CARROLL. The Senator from New Mexico said there was no basis, so far as he knew, for the second figure. I will be fair enough to say that.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct.

Mr. CARROLL. The junior Senator from California has made the real point clear. This is what I was trying to ascertain from my own State, based upon the 1-cent increase. Does this contemplate a slowdown in the program? I understand the Senator from California to say it does. Is that so?

Mr. KUCHEL. What the Senator has said is true.

Mr. CARROLL. That is all I want to know.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President——

Mr. KUCHEL. Will the Senator from Colorado listen?

Mr. CARROLL. I shall be happy to listen.

Mr. KUCHEL. It is precisely the same slowdown that is involved in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, because this provision in the bill before us is not touched by the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. CARROLL. I am not arguing with the Senator from Tennessee. I am trying to ascertain the facts. The Senator from New Mexico has established one fact, about the deficit in 1960. The Senator from California has established another fact; namely, that there is to be a slowdown in the program. That is all the junior Senator from Colorado wishes to know.

I thank the Senator from California.

Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. NEUBERGER, and Mr. BENNETT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. I say to the Senator from California that he should be extremely careful in saying that there is to be a slowdown, just as he should be extremely careful in saying that last year there was an acceleration. I thought there was an acceleration in the program for 1958, but when we presented figures to Mr. Tallamy, and he began to present figures, I listened very carefully. I got the impression from his testimony that he needed extra money to keep pace with the increased production costs, and that the program was about the same as it had been. It would have been cut down if it had not been for the extra money.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank my friend. He speaks with greater accuracy than I did when I used those words.

Mr. ANDERSON. In 1961 there will be no slowdown, because we will collect taxes through 12 months, rather than a short period.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. BENNETT. The question was raised a little earlier as to why the President proposed an increase of 1½ cents and is now willing to accept a cent, on the assumption that that would be adequate.

The House not only provided a tax increase of 1 cent, beginning in September, for 22 months, but it provided that a part of the tax on passenger automobiles and a part of the tax on parts would come in in the fiscal year 1961.

Mr. ANDERSON. 1962. It starts on July 1, 1961. The Senator must be careful.

Mr. BENNETT. It is fiscal year 1962, but calendar year 1961.

That revenue would come in to carry on the process of bringing the fund back into balance. Therefore the House felt that by this combination of a gas tax increase of 1 cent and a diversion of a part of the excise tax on passenger cars and parts, the financial need would be met. The operation would be phased in and phased out—not immediately—and the fund would be put back into a solvent condition.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I have received a letter from the deputy State highway engineer in my State, Mr. Forest Cooper, to the effect that even if House bill 8678 becomes law, the highway program in Oregon—and I presume the situation is quite similar in other States—will have to be cut back at least 25 percent.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have Mr. Cooper's letter printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF OREGON,
STATE HIGHWAY DEPARTMENT,
Salem, Oreg., August 31, 1959.

Hon. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR NEUBERGER: Thank you for your letter of August 21, and, as you suggested, I am outlining herewith what appears to be the effect of H.R. 8678 on Oregon's immediate highway future. I am answering in Mr. Williams' absence from the State.

While the proposed legislation authorizes two billion dollars for fiscal 1961, the condition of the Federal highway trust fund will govern how much work can be undertaken. It is our understanding that, even though H.R. 8678 is enacted, there will be a deficiency in the fund of some 350 million dollars near the end of this calendar year. Should this occur, the Bureau of Public Roads would have to put into effect a slow down on contracting and might have to delay the payments to the States for work already obligated and under way. This prospective delay in Federal-aid payments could be very serious as far as Oregon is concerned, providing the delay would be very prolonged. We have been advised that the Treasury Department is willing to go along on a repayable advance proposition in order to cover this anticipated deficit, but it will be necessary for Congress to authorize the procedure.

Assuming that H.R. 8678 becomes law, and further assuming that some action is taken to assure the States that Federal reimbursements can be paid with reasonable promptness, Oregon's construction program would be about 75 percent of that authorized under the 1958 highway act. While this much cutback is a disappointment to both our State Highway Commission and the local construction industry, we recognize that some slow down at this time seems inevitable.

Under such a program, we can complete the Pacific Highway to Eugene and possibly to Goshen to interstate standards; the Baldock Freeway from Salem to its connection with Harbor Drive in Portland can be finished; some progress can be made on the continuation of remodeling the Columbia River Highway as a freeway between Portland and The Dalles, and possibly a minor start can be made on the East Bank Freeway in Portland. In addition to this, a fairly comprehensive right-of-way acquisition schedule can be maintained and an adequate survey, design, and planning procedure can be continued.

The State Highway Commission appreciates the efforts you have made in behalf of highway legislation.

Very truly yours,

FORREST COOPER,
Acting State Highway Engineer.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I ask the Senator from Utah if there is any constitutional or statutory provision of law which would prevent the Senate from approving an increase of 1½ cents, rather than 1 cent, in the gasoline tax and sending it to conference with the House?

Mr. BENNETT. None at all.

Mr. NEUBERGER. It seems to me that would be wise and reasonable. We would be living up to our fiscal responsibilities by sending the 1½ cent increase to conference.

Mr. BENNETT. I remember when the Senator offered that amendment, when we were debating the question a month or so ago. I was happy to support him.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question.

I observe that it was deemed inadvisable to take out of the general fund moneys in this fiscal year and the next fiscal year, and allocate them to the trust fund. I ask the Senator from Utah why it is prudent to take the moneys out of the general fund in 1962, and is not prudent to take them out now.

A further question is, if we are afraid of a deficit now, what assurance is there that there will not be a deficit and a bad fiscal situation in 1962? I do not think any revenues should be taken from the general fund, but that new revenues should be provided, from one source or another, to finance the highway program.

Mr. BENNETT. My understanding is that a study is underway in the Bureau of Public Roads to reevaluate the cost of the program. That study will probably result in recommendations being made to Congress before July 1, 1961.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Has the Senator from California yielded the floor?

Mr. KUCHEL. I have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that no other Senator has been recognized.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from California had yielded to me to answer a question.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I believe the situation is that the Senator from California yielded the floor to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] who asked if he might propound a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has yielded the floor. No other Senator has been recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask for recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not trying to take the floor from the Senator from Ohio. I therefore ask unanimous consent that, without losing the floor, I may yield to the Senator from Ohio to address a question to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BENNETT. I appreciate the courtesy. A study is being made, the results of which will be made available to the Committee on Finance, to the House Committee on Ways and Means, and to the Committees on Public Works of the two bodies. It will be made available in ample time so that before July 1, 1961, we may have before us recommendations which will result in changes in the taxation pattern to support the program. But if we do not, we have put a backstop in the bill.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. This report shows that in 1962 $802 million will have been taken out of the general fund and put into the highway trust fund. I have grave apprehensions about that kind of fiscal policy, because I believe that in 1962 the Government will be in the same difficult fiscal position with respect to the general fund as it is now, in fiscal 1960.

Mr. BENNETT. But before then Congress will have had an opportunity to review the situation.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from Utah.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask for the floor in order that I might comment on the letter which the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] placed in the RECORD. The letter reads, in part:

> While the proposed legislation authorizes two billion dollars for fiscal 1961, the condition of the Federal highway trust fund will govern how much work can be undertaken. It is our understanding that, even though H.R. 8678 is enacted, there will be a deficiency in the fund of some $350 million near the end of this calendar year.

That is exactly what I said. Everyone who was listening heard what I said. There will be a deficit as of December 31. But I pointed out that the deficit, which came to $157 million by June 30, will be taken care of by extra collections which might have come in by that time.

The letter continues:

> Should this occur, the Bureau of Public Roads would have to put into effect a slowdown on contracting and might have to delay the payments to the States for work already obligated and under way. This prospective delay in Federal-aid payments could be very serious as far as Oregon is concerned, providing the delay would be very prolonged. We have been advised that the Treasury Department is willing to go along on a repayable advance proposition in order to cover this anticipated deficit, but it will be necessary for Congress to authorize the procedure.

Again, that is what I pointed out a short while ago. Legislation will be proposed to provide for an authorization whereby the Treasury Department can advance the $350 million which would be necessary on December 31 and get it back out of collections.

So I say the letter from the State of Oregon does not contradict, but confirms, exactly what has been said to the Senate.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, it seems to me that some Senators, even after all this discussion, do not understand the amendment now before us. The amendment would provide more revenue than the House bill provides. The amendment would merely raise the additional funds for the Government in a somewhat different way than that proposed in the House bill. For most of the projects which the Federal Government constructs, such as waterways, dams, reclamation, and almost anything else of that kind, in most instances the money is appropriated, and Congress then looks at the budget to see if more taxes are necessary, and provides them if necessary. That is how the foreign-aid program is handled for example.

Some years ago someone suggested that inasmuch as this program was for the benefit of highway users, they should pay for it. I suppose one reason advanced was that Congress had just finished cutting taxes by $9 billion in the previous session, based on this administration's recommendations. So rather than to have the administration say it had cut taxes too greatly, it was said that the highway users should pay for the highway program, rather than rescinding some of the previous tax cut. I am one who did not vote to increase the tax on gasoline at that time.

I ask unanimous consent that a statement that I have prepared be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

So-called automotive taxes

[Dollars in millions]

	Estimated collections fiscal 1960	Transferred to highway trust fund
		Percent	Amount
Gasoline	$1,750	100	$1,750
Lubricating oil	70	0	0
Passenger cars	1,300	0	0
Trucks and buses	225	50	112
Auto parts and accessories	175	0	0
Tires, tubes, and tread rubber	275	100	275
Diesel and special motor fuel	55	100	55
Use tax on certain vehicles	35	100	35
Total	3,885		2,227

Amount of so-called automotive taxes retained in general fund of the Treasury—$1,658 million, or 43 percent.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, the highway users at that time even under the new program, were going to pay twice as much as the cost of what the Federal Government proposed to do.

Under the present situation, only 58 percent of the excise taxes imposed on highway users will go into the fund. I heard some reference made by the acting minority leader, the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], to the effect that the House exercised careful statesmanship in working out the highway bill. I cannot find any ideological conflict between what the House did and what the Senate proposes to do.

The administration asked the House for a 1½-cent increase in the gasoline tax. The House said it would not grant a cent-and-a-half increase but would agree to a 1-cent increase. The House said it would take some of the taxes on passenger cars, automobile parts, and accessories, and put a part of them into the fund starting in fiscal year 1962, which means beginning July 1, 1961.

If it is wrong now to do what the Senator from Tennessee says, namely, to take some of the excise taxes on new cars, auto parts, and accessories, and put them into the fund, then what makes it right to do it in 1962? It is fair to give highway users the same credit in the highway fund for what they pay in excise taxes on passenger cars, auto parts and accessories. If it is right to do it in 1962, it is right now.

The Senator from Tennessee merely proposes to advance the date, so that highway users will be given some credit on the excise taxes they are paying on cars, parts, and accessories now, rather than to build the highways now with increased gasoline taxes. The proposal of the Senator from Tennessee would raise more money for the Government than the provision he is proposing to eliminate from the bill. This is a question of opposing points of view.

Let us keep this in mind.

I ask Senators to examine the report of the House committee to the House. It is not a majority report; it is made up of a group of supplemental views, because none of the House committee members could bring forth a measure with which all of them would be satisfied.

In the first set of supplemental views, the largest of the groups said that the method proposed was a very unfair and very inequitable way of handling the matter, because the highway users are already paying too much taxes. That was the conclusion which the largest group of the House committee members reached.

Then they said that the measure they were reporting was the best they could report to the House, under the circumstances. Apparently someone had been consulting with the White House, and had been informed that that arrangement would be acceptable.

But the largest single group of the House committee members said the bill was inequitable and unfair and provided for the most unfair way they could think of to finance the program.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] is trying to have the Senate take action in line with the views of the largest single group of the House committee members, who thought that some other method of raising revenue would be more fair.

What does the Senator from Tennessee propose? He proposes the elimination of a tax advantage which I submit has never been favored by a majority of either the House or the Senate. That tax advantage exists in the tax law only by accident.

I am one of the few Members of the Senate who voted for that tax advantage when it went into effect the first time. I recall the history of that matter in 1954. I told a number of my constituents that I would vote for it. When it came up, a motion to strike it out was made; and the motion to strike it out of the bill was agreed to, and it was stricken out of the bill, which had come to the Senate from the House. The vote in the Senate was 71 to 7; and I was one of the 7. So the action the Senate took at that time was taken by a majority of 10 to 1.

I heard the statement made, here on the floor of the Senate, that some great ideological difference is involved.

Mr. President, I have no ideological problem here. I supported that tax advantage or exemption, until the Senate decided that it did not want it. I respected the opinion of the 10-to-1 majority of the Senate Members who said they did not want to permit such a tax advantage.

The result of striking out this tax advantage, as we now propose, will be to bring into the Treasury more revenue than that which would be obtained by increasing the gasoline tax by 1 cent a gallon.

We are proposing to strike out this tax advantage, which was put through in the House under a closed rule. It got through the House only because it was included in a package bill, in a situation in which the only motion which could be made at that time was a single motion to recommit.

At the time that this tax advantage got into the law, I suppose it would have been stricken out by both the House and the Senate, if the House had had an opportunity to vote on a motion to that effect, by a majority of similar to the majority by which the Senate had voted to strike it out.

In the conference, the House conferees included some very firm and very determined Members. I have seen what we can expect from some of the House conferees who are members of the Ways and Means Committee, and who insist on having everything their way. The late Representative Reed, one of the House conferees, was successful in getting the Senate conferees to agree to half of what the House had sent to the Senate. The dividend credit began at 8 percent, in the House bill; and the conferees settled for a 4-percent dividend credit. Senators did not like it; but that is how it got into the law.

The House has never been permitted to vote on it since that time.

This year, we sent this measure to the House; and it was in conference. The House conferees would not permit the House to vote on the question of removing this tax advantage. If they ever permitted the House to vote on the question of removing it, the House would certainly vote to remove it, just as the Senate did.

So this tax advantage is now in the tax laws only by accident. A majority of each House has always been opposed to it; yet it remains in the law. That situation is a tribute to the power of a small group of House committee members, who were able to get into the law, and keep in the law, this tax advantage, solely by preventing both the majority of the House to have an opportunity to vote this tax advantage out of the law.

So we now propose to eliminate the tax advantage, and to advance the date when the highway users will receive some credit for the taxes they are paying on their purchases of passenger cars, automobile parts, and accessories.

But I repeat that, there is no ideological conflict in my mind in regard to this matter. I was one of the seven Senators who voted for this tax advantage the first time it came before the Senate. I was one of those who voted to eliminate it after I found that it had not been favored by a majority, and that it offered no particular advantage over other tax measures.

The highway users already are paying almost twice as much tax as is required by the highway fund. The largest single group of members of the House committee which reported this measure to the floor of the House stated in their report—and now I quote from page 61 of the House committee report:

> There are more equitable methods of increasing the general revenue than by imposing an additional gasoline tax.

They also said:

> The administration's underlying purpose for the additional 1-cent gasoline tax is to provide a surplus in the general budget, at the expense of the highway users.

That is what was said in that report by the largest single group of members of the House committee which reported this proposal to the floor of the House.

So, Mr. President, I say that the elimination of this special tax advantage would be a better way, and would raise more money, than the proposal the House has sent to us.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Louisiana has dramatically, ably, and accurately pointed out that the measure which I have offered with his cosponsorship will bring to the Government more revenue in fiscal 1960 than will the pending bill.

I wish to ask the Senator from Louisiana if, on the other hand, it is true—and I should like to have the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] hear this—

Let me ask the Senator from Louisiana whether he will yield further.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Louisiana has pointed out most dramatically how this piece of favoritism, in the form of a tax advantage, is a tribute to a gag rule that usually is applied to all tax measures in the other body; in fact, it always is applied.

I should like to say that I enjoy the freedom of being a Member of the U.S. Senate. I served in the other body for 14 years; but in all that time I never had an opportunity to offer one amendment to a tax bill, and I do not recall that I ever had an opportunity to vote on one. As a Member of the House, I found that its Members were regularly faced with a question of "take it or leave it" or "vote for all of it or vote against all of it"—in other words, either to accept or reject an entire package.

That is what the House was faced with in connection with the bill now before us. The House Members had to vote either for no highway program at all or for an increase in the gasoline tax; and even under those circumstances, 163 Members of the other body voted against the bill.

Just as the Senator from Louisiana has pointed out, my amendment will bring into the Treasury, in this fiscal year, slightly more revenue than will the pending bill.

I wish to ask the Senator from Louisiana if it is true that my amendment will not create any new obligations.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. That is correct.

Mr. GORE. My amendment merely provides that the Government will meet the obligations which the Congress created with the apportionment bill last year. Those apportionment bills have been passed since 1916; and this is the first time the States have been faced with a default on the part of the Government.

Only a few moments ago I read the testimony of Mr. Tallamy to the effect that under the provisions of the House version of the bill, there would be a deficit in the trust fund, at the end of this fiscal year, of $157 million, plus $3 million interest.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to ascertain how much revenue the Gore amendment will provide or what funds it will make available.

I read from paragraph (A):

> (A) that portion of the taxes received in the Treasury after June 30, 1959, and before July 1, 1960, under section 4061(a)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (tax on passenger automobiles, etc.) which is equal to the amount which would have been so received if the tax rate under such section had been 4 percent in lieu of the applicable rate; and

What will the 4 percent produce in the first year?

Mr. GORE. Approximately $520 million. That tax is levied now.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Paragraph (B) deals with the same subject, but covers the period beginning June 30, 1960.

Mr. GORE. That is correct; and the Senator from Ohio will find that the House version appropriates to the trust fund part of the automobile excise tax revenue, beginning in fiscal 1962.

Mr. LAUSCHE. So $520 million will be produced out of the excise tax in 1959.

Mr. GORE. The Government will receive the same amount of money from the automobile excise tax, under either version of the bill.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Very well. But I understand that $520 million will be received from the excise tax in the fiscal year 1960.

Mr. GORE. That will be a transfer, not a levy.

Mr. LAUSCHE. And $335 million will be produced by removing the dividend credit for individual taxpayers, as I understand.

Mr. GORE. That is correct; and that amount is to be compared with the estimated $333 million which the 1-cent-a-gallon gasoline tax would produce for the remainder of this fiscal year.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Then the total which would be produced by the Gore amendment during the first year would be approximately $850 million?

Mr. GORE. That is not correct. The automobile excise tax is already levied. Neither bill levies a new excise tax on automobiles.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I understand that, but there is $1,500 million of excise taxes and accessories on automobiles which now goes into the general fund.

Mr. GORE. The bill before the Senate would allocate no part of the excise taxes to which the Senator has referred, except 40 percent of the automobile tax, to the highway trust fund.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That would produce $520 million.

Mr. GORE. It would not produce; it would transfer.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It would transfer to the highway trust fund.

Mr. GORE. That is right. The House bill would produce $333 million for the highway trust fund.

Mr. LAUSCHE. By the 1-cent gas tax.

Mr. GORE. But the deficit is $493 million; so it would leave a net deficit in the trust fund of $160 million.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That is correct. But the $520 million which would be transferred out of the general fund and into the highway trust fund would be taken away from a potential use in the general operation of the Government.

Mr. GORE. Instead, the revenue from the repeal of the dividend tax credit would go, not into the trust fund, but into the general fund.

Mr. SPARKMAN. How much is that?

Mr. LAUSCHE. That is $335 million, I understand. Will the Senator from Tennessee now tabulate the figures as he understands them, stating how much more money would be available from the trust fund and how much more money would come into the general fund?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, if the Senator will look at the figures I have before me, I believe he can see what would happen. Under the House bill an additional 1-cent tax on gasoline would be levied and that would be directed into the fund. That would produce about $330 million for the next year. In fiscal year 1962, which means July 1961, one-half of the tax which is at present being collected on passenger cars would be directed toward the fund, and five-eighths of the tax which is now being collected on auto parts and accessories would be directed into the fund.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes. I have that and I have another figure.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Instead of that, the Senator from Tennessee proposes that we approach the problem in this way: Instead of waiting until 1962 to put some of the funds from the tax on passenger cars into the highway fund, he would put in 40 percent starting now.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That is correct.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Then he would make up that revenue, or most of it—at least, more than the 1-cent gasoline tax would bring—by eliminating the tax advantage, which many of us feel never should have been in the law. I am one of those who voted to keep it. That being the case, the revenue to the Government would be more. The expenditures from the fund would be somewhat greater.

But the reason we would do that would be to avoid having to decline the fulfillment of Federal commitments on the highway program. In other words, rather than having a slow down by the so-called method of contract control, we would allot money less rapidly than was intended. We would simply go forward with the program as planned when the program was put into effect.

Mr. COOPER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. I invite the attention of the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Louisiana, who stated that the revenue which would be produced by the Gore amendment would be greater than the revenue produced by the committee bill. I wish to point out a distinction which should be made. It is not a question of the total revenue for all purposes which would be produced. The question is the effect the Gore amendment would have on the trust fund, and on the general funds available for all appropriations.

I believe this is a correct statement: The Gore amendment would make the trust fund solvent, but it would take away from the general funds available for all appropriations nearly $200 million. If there were a deficit, it would add to that deficit in the general fund $200 million. If there were no deficit, it would take that amount away from the general fund.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I should like to ask my question.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I believe I have the floor. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. Is it not correct that while the trust fund would be made solvent by this device, the general fund would be reduced by nearly $200 million a year?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Gore amendment would create no new obligation whatever. The difference is that unless we adopt the Gore amendment, the passage of the committee bill will mean a slowdown by the method of contract control, which I interpret to be just a way of letting the money go more slowly than was intended, so as to slow down the program. That is in violation of the contracts that were made with 50 different States.

Mr. COOPER. I ask the Senator, which is more important, to slow down the highway program by a year or two, or to take $200 million out of the general fund and create a deficit? I want the pay-as-you-go principle to be maintained.

Mr. GORE. The highway trust fund has a deficit of $493 million this year. What for? For contracts that are being completed this year under an agreement between our respective States and the Bureau of Roads. Unless we put the money in the trust fund to fulfill those commitments, the State of Kentucky and the State of Tennessee will be left holding the bag, owing contractors who have completed their contracts, because the Federal Government is in default.

Mr. COOPER. I am not worried about that. It will be corrected by the committee bill.

Mr. GORE. I do not know why the Senator should not worry about it.

Mr. COOPER. I ask my friend if he will answer my question.

Mr. GORE. I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I ask if I may yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from Louisiana yielded the floor?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I would prefer to yield to the Senator from Tennessee, who has the best understanding of the problem, since he was a member of the Public Works Committee when the interstate program was started.

Mr. COOPER. I simply wish to know the fact. The Senator from Ohio raised this question. I therefore ask these questions for information. I know the Senator from Tennessee is one of the authors of the bill and that he has a great interest in it. He has said that the transfer of a part of the excise tax derived from automobiles, accessories and parts, involved the transfer of $520 million from the general fund to the trust fund. Now the Senator says that by removing the exemption on dividends we would increase the general fund by $335 million. That would mean that we would have reduced the general fund by $185 million a year. Is that correct?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER. Your amendment would make the highway trust fund solvent?

Mr. GORE. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER. But it would reduce the general fund by $185 million a year.

Mr. GORE. Why does the trust fund need to be solvent? Because there is a solid commitment to the States to reimburse them for contracts, on a matching basis, which contracts have been approved by the Department of Commerce of the U.S. Government.

The contracts are being completed. Payment is due. Either this Congress provides the funds, or the Government of the United States is going to be in default to the respective States.

Mr. COOPER. In the Public Works Committee it was said, as I understood it, that the additional 1-cent gasoline tax will provide the money needed in the next 3 years to meet the needs of the program, with some deceleration. I again ask the question, What is more important? To delay the final completion of the program a year or two, or to create a deficit in the general fund of $200 million a year? I think it better to stretch out the program than to engage in deficit financing from the general funds.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. First let me answer that question. The question is twofold. The first is, "Which way would you rather raise money? Would you rather raise the money by raising a 3-cent to a 4-cent tax on gasoline, or would you rather leave it as it is and take away the dividend tax advantage? Do you want to finance the program with a 4-cent gasoline tax, when the States need to tax the same item, anyway, or would you rather take away a special tax advantage which neither a majority in the Senate nor in the House wanted, and which never would have been in the law if it had not been for a rule in the House which prevented an amendment to strike it?"

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator let me answer his question?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I would prefer to avoid impairing the general fund and imposing the 1-cent tax, and remove the credits given to the dividend collectors.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I intended to ask a mere rhetorical question. I am sure the answers will vary, as we shall see when we call the roll. The question is, Which way is the better way to raise the money? By taking away a tax advantage which 90 percent of the Senate, and I am sure 90 percent of the House, never were for, or to put this extra 1-cent tax on gasoline, which is a very regressive tax, and a tax which the States need for themselves.

Secondly, what about the 50 States? Contracts are being completed in those States. Is the Federal Government going to live up to its commitments to put up the money, or slow down its payments, and, in effect, default on its commitments to 50 different States, which are really contracts with the States?

Some persons would say to their constituents, "Well, I would rather delay the highway program than to see the Federal Government go $100 million in debt." I ask them, Did you take that point of view when the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] asked you to delay the veterans' bill so as to keep the Federal Government in better fiscal condition? No, you voted for the Kerr amendment and voted for the Government to assume that liability. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] was trying to tell you that the widows could wait a couple of years and that pensions to widows of veterans who had no service-connected disabilities could be postponed for 2 years before going into effect. You said you could not wait. Senators voted for an amendment which will cost $10 billion during the next 40 years. They could not wait to get that into the law.

Are we going to take the attitude that the Federal Government is going to default on its commitments to 50 States which have contracts within those States because, while we could not wait to provide new pensions for widows of veterans with no service connected disability? It does not make sense to me.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER]?

In my judgment, what the Senator from Kentucky has said is correct. If the Gore amendment is adopted, there will be a deficit of $185 million in the general fund for 1960. If the Gore amendment is adopted, I intend to call up my amendment "C," which would impose an obligation to withhold taxes on interest and dividend at the source. If that amendment carries, instead of a deficit of $185 million for 1960, the general fund will have a surplus of $145 million for 1960, and in each year thereafter the surplus in the general fund will increase.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

So the amendment of Mr. GORE in the nature of a substitute for title II, as amended, was rejected.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the Gore amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I offer my amendment, which is at the desk, and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 203. Tax on passenger automobiles, etc.

Section 4061(a)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to tax on passenger automobiles, etc.) is amended by striking out "on and after July 1, 1960, the rate shall be 7 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "(A) on and after July 1, 1960, and before July 1, 1961, the rate shall be 7 percent, (B) on and after July 1, 1961, and before July 1, 1962, the rate shall be 6 percent, and (C) on and after July 1, 1962, the rate shall be 5 percent".

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. McNAMARA. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan would like to have the yeas and nays ordered on his amendment. In order that all Senators may be on notice, I ask that they join us in the request.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand that the Senator from Michigan expects to explain his amendment briefly.

Mr. BUSH. We cannot hear what the majority leader is saying.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Michigan does not expect to speak at great length—perhaps 20 minutes—on his amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered on it. I expect that a vote on the amendment will be had within the next 30 minutes. I hope that Senators will be on notice in that regard. I thank my friend from Michigan for yielding.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, we now have before us one of the most important bills of this frequently frustrating session.

The bill provides for additional financing for the Federal highway program—financing that is vital at this stage in order to continue work on this 41,000-mile interstate network of roads.

It is extremely unfortunate that deliberations on achieving the necessary financing—deliberations outside the control of the Senate—have taken so long.

We are now presented with the measure in the closing days of the session.

Despite what I—and I am sure many of my colleagues—consider great defects and inequities in the bill, we are forced to consider it under the impediment of time.

We are faced with what almost amounts to a take-it-or-leave-it situation.

Those of us who took part in the development of this tremendous highway program have little choice between seeing it die or accepting the unattractive features of the bill before us.

Those features are self-evident.

One provides for a 1-cent increase in the Federal gasoline tax for a 21-month period—another unfair burden on the already hard-pressed consumer.

A second feature dedicates one-half of the 10-percent automobile excise tax and five-eights of the parts tax to the highway trust fund.

These are two bitter pills. They certainly contain nothing that I—as a Senator from Michigan—can swallow with any degree of enthusiasm.

A few minutes ago I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, which also proposed to transfer excise taxes to the highway trust fund. I do not want my vote for his amendment to reflect my endorsement of the concept.

However, the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee also included repeal of the dividend tax credit, a proposal I find very attractive and worthwhile. This added a little sweetening to the bitter pill. It is like taking castor oil with orange juice.

Realistically, the only thing to recommend the legislation is the knowledge that failure to approve it would result in a drastic curtailment of the Federal highway construction program.

This is an alternative so devastating as to represent no alternative at all.

For if the highway construction program was essential when it was adopted 3 years ago, its essentiality has only increased with the passage of time.

The considerations of national defense which led to the establishment of this program are as valid today as they were 3 years ago.

The desire to improve traffic safety through the construction of adequate roads has increased with the growing population and the ever-increasing use of automobiles and trucks in interstate transportation.

The tremendous impact of this program on our national economy, providing as it does more than 700,000 jobs directly or indirectly, is of the greatest importance.

These vast numbers of working men and women and large and small contractors have accepted jobs and undertaken obligations, relying on the belief that when Congress said it was going to institute a long-range road program Congress meant what it said and would honor its word.

These and other considerations have served to make mandatory some program for additional financing in the next few years.

We all recognize, I think, that the road building operation is one which cannot be subjected to wide fluctuations from year to year.

This is certainly inherent in the planned apportionment—and 13-year duration of the program—set forth in the original 1956 act.

So, Mr. President, as I see it, we in the Senate have little or no alternative but to develop an immediate, short-term, revenue program, one which would enable us to continue the highway program with the smallest possible abatement.

If left to my own devices I would not have selected an increase in the gasoline tax as the means by which to raise the additional revenue needed to sustain this program.

I think that the motoring public is already being taxed to the extent that this group should be required to bear in financing the highway building program.

This 1-cent gas tax increase, when added to the existing 3-cent Federal rate and the 6- or 7-cent per gallon tax rate in the States, means that whenever the driver fills his 20-gallon tank at the service station, up to $2 of what he pays will be earmarked, under either Federal or State law, for highway and other road construction and improvements.

And we must recognize that this is another of those consumer taxes which is unrelated to ability to pay.

Certainly an automobile can no longer be reasonably classed as a luxury. Automobiles and automotive transportation are today a necessity. This is admitted by everyone with the possible exception of tax architects in the Treasury Department.

Yet we are now confronted with a proposal which will not only increase the cost of the operation of an automobile, but which could perpetuate much of the discriminatory excise tax now levied against automotive consumers under existing law.

Mr. President, much as I dislike the idea of an increase in the gas tax, I can as a realist accept it.

However, even as a realist I cannot accept the logic of those who now propose, contrary to all prior arguments, to take from the general fund of the Treasury such a large portion of the automotive excise taxes.

These are the same taxes, believe it or not, which less than 3 short months ago were so essential to the integrity of the general fund that we passed legislation to extend their existing high rate in order to avoid a scheduled 3-percentage-point reduction in them.

Now we do not even have the sweetener that the Senator from Tennessee offered, repeal of the dividend tax credit.

I understand there are those who urge that there is really nothing to be alarmed about in the inclusion of the scheduled transfer of excise taxes beginning in July 1961, since the Department of Commerce is expected to submit financing recommendations at the conclusion of its study of the Federal highway program.

These recommendations are due in January of 1961, 6 months before the effective date of the transfer proposed by the pending bill.

It is then suggested, despite the apparent finality with which this transfer is accomplished in the pending bill, that Congress will be able to study the recommendations of the executive branch and perhaps produce a source of revenue which will remove the need of such a transfer.

This seems so unrealistic as to be comical, since we have known about the financing problem in the roads program for more than 9 months in this session of the Congress. Yet the pending bill is apparently the end product of our best fiscal thinkers.

Another thing which makes me doubt that the proposed transfer is temporary is that I have had some experience in witnessing how the executive branch, when confronted with difficult dilemmas like the one which has been handed them in the proposed study, frequently utilize congressional actions in support of their recommendations.

Briefly, my experience leads me to believe that with the proposed transfer we probably are providing at least one—and probably a major—recommendation of the Department of Commerce in its 1961 study.

As a matter of fact, it would be quite convenient for the Department of Commerce, when it submitted its recommendation, to say to Congress that the transfer provided in the existing legislation is sufficient to supply the additional funds required.

Or, if costs rise, or a more ambitious program is recommended, the Department might call for the dedication of the remainder of the excise tax revenues not already committed by the Congress.

However, again speaking as a realist, I doubt that this can be accomplished at this late date, especially since it is necessary for highway departments to plan ahead.

Mr. President, I have tried to consider what could be done to salvage some measure of relief for the automotive consumer in this legislation.

I have done so because I am aware that while the proposal is supposedly a temporary transfer of automotive excise taxes to the highway trust fund, I know, too, that in the tax field what is called temporary is often more permanent than that which is said to be permanent.

I also recognize that with the dedication of a portion of the automotive excise taxes to the highway trust fund there will be a distinct tendency, particularly on the part of those who desire to avoid linkage of some other tax to the trust fund, to suggest that the remaining, uncommitted portion of such excise taxes be transferred to the trust fund.

I am aware of these tendencies, as are other Members of this body. Consequently, I propose that Congress demonstrate its good faith and incorporate in the proposed legislation provisions which would not only reaffirm the reduction in the automotive excise tax to 7 percent, scheduled for July 1, 1960, but, in addition, schedule an additional one percentage point reduction in this tax for each of the next 2 fiscal years beginning July 1, 1961, and July 1, 1962, respectively.

The adoption of such a proposal would reassure the automotive purchaser that Congress has no further intention of cementing uncommitted portions of the auto excise tax permanently into the tax structure by transfer to the highway trust fund.

The anticipated loss of revenue would be small. The long-pledged, but not yet realized reduction to 7 percent, which is now scheduled to go into effect July 1, 1960, would, under current estimates, result in a loss of less than $350 million.

This does not take into account the strong likelihood that such a reduction in automobile excise taxes would result in increased sales and, therefore, additional tax revenues.

In the succeeding 2 years, when the one percentage point reduction per year is contemplated, the annual loss of revenue would total less than $115 million.

It does not take an accomplished mathematician to figure out that the combined 3-year loss of revenue represents but one one-hundred-and-sixtieth of the revenues needed to sustain a budget of $80 billion.

Further, I am convinced that the beneficial effect upon auto sales would completely offset this so-called loss with additional tax revenues.

Mr. President, I do not know why I trouble myself and the other Members of this body with a recitation of how small the loss of revenue would be under the amendment which I propose. It is so obvious from the pending legislation itself that the general fund of the Treasury no longer needs the revenue provided by the automotive excise tax.

This is readily apparent from the provisions of the bill which, without regard to the fiscal situation in 1961, transfer over half of the receipts from automotive excise taxes to the highway trust fund, and away from the general fund of the Treasury.

Surely if the general fund of the Treasury can spare the revenues provided by the major portion of the automotive excise taxes, there is no need to deny the automotive consumer the reduction he has long been promised.

All my amendment proposes, in addition, is that we give the automotive consumer the additional pledge that, in exchange for his patience to date, he will receive an additional 1 percentage point reduction in the automotive excise tax annually for a period of 2 additional years.

This is such a minor pledge to such an overwhelming number of people in this country that it is difficult for me to believe that it could not readily be accepted for inclusion in the pending amendment.

I have spoken of this amendment in terms of relief for the automotive consumer.

Last year, when my amendment to cut the auto excise tax in half was before the Senate, I noted that I had previously questioned whether such a reduction would be passed on to the automobile purchaser.

The major automobile companies and dealers at that time assured us in messages which can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I have been reassured that the pledges made then are still in effect.

Consequently, the consumer would be the real beneficiary of the excise tax reductions which I propose. This would represent a first step to that widely heralded—but elusive—goal of reducing the cost of living.

Mr. President, the text of the amendment I propose is very simple.

I want to emphasize that it costs no money at this time, and consequently would not affect the current budget; it does not affect the operation of the highway program; and its basic purpose is to carry out the promise made to the American people—namely, that this unfair automobile excise tax would be reduced.

My amendment provides that on July 1, 1960, the automotive excise tax rate would be reduced from 10 percent to 7 percent. On July 1, 1961, there will be an additional one percentage point reduction, so that the rate then would be 6 percent. On July 1, 1962, there would be a further one percentage point reduction, so that the ultimate tax rate for automobiles would be 5 percent, which is the amount which the pending legislation proposes to transfer to the highway trust fund, beginning July 1, 1961.

Mr. President, I think this is a fair proposal. I think it can be adopted, now that it is no longer asserted that the revenues from the automotive excise taxes are essential to the fiscal well-being of the general fund of the Treasury.

I hope the Members of this body will support this amendment, in order that the automotive consumers of this country will at last receive the relief they so well deserve.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. McNAMARA. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Do I correctly understand that the Senator from Michigan is proposing to cut the excise taxes on automobiles by 5 percent, over a period of 3 years?

Mr. McNAMARA. I propose that early next year, the Korean war tax, which was three additional percentage points—bringing the total tax from 7 percent to 10 percent—be dropped; and in the next 2 years, we drop or decrease the tax one percentage point each year, leaving a total of 5 percent. This is the amount of the excise tax which the pending bill proposes be used for highway construction purposes.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. McNAMARA. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. KERR. The present rate is 7 percent, is it not?

Mr. McNAMARA. No; the present rate is 10 percent, because we keep extending the Korean war tax of 3 percent, when it was supposed to be cut back.

Mr. KERR. That is aside from the basic 7 percent, is it not?

Mr. McNAMARA. That is correct; it is in addition.

Mr. KERR. I mean insofar as the continuing tax, which is 7 percent, is concerned.

Mr. McNAMARA. But it is now 10 percent.

Mr. KERR. But the 3 percent is for a particular period of time, and the 7 percent is permanent; is that not correct?

Mr. McNAMARA. That is correct.

Mr. KERR. Will the Senator from Michigan tell us how much revenue the total 10 percent produces annually?

Mr. McNAMARA. I have the figures before me.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the Senator from Michigan not agree that the total cost of his amendment would be $1,560 million?

Mr. McNAMARA. That figure has been stated several times this evening.

Mr. ANDERSON. That total is composed as follows: $390 million the first year, $520 million the second year, and $650 million the third year—or a total of approximately $1,560 million.

Mr. McNAMARA. Yes. It would be an estimated $520 million a year for a full year period. That would leave the 5 percent.

Mr. KERR. I should like to go about the matter in a different way, if the Senator from Michigan will permit.

Mr. McNAMARA. Of course.

Mr. KERR. The total amount of revenue from the 10 percent tax is how much?

Mr. McNAMARA. It is twice the amount from the 5 percent, or approximately $1,200 million a year.

Mr. KERR. One billion two hundred million dollars a year?

Mr. McNAMARA. That is correct.

Mr. KERR. Of the total of 10 percent, 3 percent has a termination date in the law; is that correct?

Mr. McNAMARA. That is correct. I want this amendment to be adopted, so that we shall honor our commitment at that time, when we come to it, which is July 1, 1960.

Mr. KERR. That is the termination date of the 3-percent tax, is it?

Mr. McNAMARA. That is correct.

Mr. KERR. If the amendment of the Senator from Michigan were adopted, there would be written into the law a termination date for half of the 10 percent, would there not?

Mr. McNAMARA. Yes, because there would also be a removal of one percentage point each year, for each of the following 2 years, according to this amendment.

Mr. KERR. So the only continuing part of the tax which would be provided in the law would be the 5 percent; and the proceeds from the 5 percent would go into the trust fund?

Mr. McNAMARA. That is correct.

Mr. KERR. In the absence of continuing legislation with reference to the other 5 percent, the revenue loss after July 1, 1961, which would be the beginning of the fiscal year 1962, would be four-tenths of $1,200 million; and for the following fiscal year it would be one-half of $1,200 million; is that correct?

Mr. McNAMARA. That is correct.

Mr. KERR. I merely wish to make clear that the amendment of the Senator from Michigan would have the effect of reducing the amount remaining in the general revenue fund, from this source, to the extent of the figures we have stated during this colloquy.

Mr. McNAMARA. That is entirely correct.

I say there is every justification for doing so. The 3 percent tax was added at the time of the Korean war. These funds are not needed, according to the plan now recommended to us by the House of Representatives and by the Senate Finance Committee.

Mr. KERR. Does the Senator from Michigan mean they are not required?

Mr. McNAMARA. They are not required in the highway trust fund, because we have this plan.

Mr. KERR. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Michigan that, as one member of the Finance Committee which brought this bill to the floor, if I had thought we could have transferred all of the automotive excise tax to the highway trust fund, beginning this fall, and could have gotten the bill signed by the President, I would have endeavored to do so.

The only reason why I, as one member of the committee, voted to limit the action to half of the 10 percent, to go into the trust fund beginning July 1, 1961, was that I thought that would be the most we could take out of the revenue fund and still have the bill signed by the President.

I thought there was such an overwhelming necessity to have a highway bill enacted into law that I went along with the program in the Finance Committee.

I hope the Senator from Michigan will not press for the adoption of his amendment, because, frankly, I think its adoption would jeopardize the enactment of the entire bill.

Mr. McNAMARA. I wish to state for the RECORD that I appreciate the frankness of the Senator from Oklahoma. He is always frank and honest about such matters.

But I have stated that I fear that if this guarantee is not given now, it will be only a matter of time until the U.S. Government will find it expedient to continue this 10-percent tax, which I say is the most unfair tax of all the excise taxes the people pay. The automotive industry carries many times its share of the tax burden, in proportion to the amount carried by any other industry. This tax is a most unfair one.

I am sure that if Senators will give this matter proper consideration, they will not want this tax continued.

Mr. KERR. I agree with the Senator's belief that this tax should be eliminated as soon as it is possible to do so.

But I fear that if we were to eliminate it by means of this bill, instead of helping either the automotive industry or the highway program, we would only get the bill vetoed.

Mr. McNAMARA. My interest is not confined to the automotive industry and the highway program; I am also interested in the consumers—all of the people of the United States.

Mr. KERR. The Senator from Michigan admits, does he not, that if his amendment were adopted, there would be a possibility that the entire bill would be vetoed?

Mr. McNAMARA. Of course there is always a possibility of a veto. Some of the vetoes have been most astonishing to both me and the Senator from Oklahoma, I am sure.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, let me inquire in what year the 3 percent reduction would go into effect.

Mr. McNAMARA. Beginning July 1, 1960.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not know that we should be afraid of a veto as the Senator from Oklahoma suggests.

Mr. McNAMARA. I am sure he was being facetious.

Mr. McCARTHY. As I recall, when we extended the excise profits tax, this year, the Senator from Oklahoma submitted an amendment—which was retained in the bill—which repealed, at the end of the fiscal year, the tax on communications; and, as I recall, that amendment involved a tax loss of approximately $500 million.

Mr. KERR. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, I am not sure of the exact cost of the amendment. What was its cost?

Mr. KERR. Approximately $300 million.

Mr. McCARTHY. And it was to go into effect at the end of the next fiscal year. I think the Senator from Michigan might very well take the same chance, in the case of his amendment.

Mr. McNAMARA. I will gladly run the risk.

Mr. McCARTHY. Particularly since the new Secretary of Commerce, soon after he took office, made a speech in which he boldly said the administration favored tax reduction, but not at this time.

It seems to me that is the position of the Senator from Michigan, in connection with his amendment—namely, to favor tax cuts, not now, but about 1 year from now.

Mr. McNAMARA. Yes; and we already have this commitment to the automotive consumers and to the automotive industry.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Director of the Bureau of the Budget, when he appeared before us, stated he was not too much concerned, and that they were not quite satisfied with the action taken by the House, because he said that the Secretary of Commerce would submit a report to Congress early in 1961 which would take into account the question of equitable distribution of tax burdens.

So they might very well make a recommendation to us taking into account what the Senator is proposing.

Mr. McNAMARA. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNAMARA. I yield to my colleague, who is a cosponsor of the amendment.

Mr. HART. I thank the Senator. I hesitate to inject anything for fear that what I might say might be regarded as a nationalistic undertaking which is worthy of the support of only 1 of the 50 States.

As the senior Senator from Michigan has stated, we are talking about a commodity which affects intimately most families in the Nation. The Senate will recall that several months ago the Senate, notwithstanding the then fiscal needs of the Nation, removed one of the excise taxes which had been imposed. As I recall, it affected transportation of passengers for hire. This was done because, among other reasons, there was an element of unfairness in the tax, and travel in most cases was said to be a necessity. At that time I made the motion that we treat similarly the 3-percent post-Korea excise tax. I was beaten. I suggest that this is the way to accomplish the object I sought when I was told the Senate would consider this proposal very quickly when the transition could be reasonably made.

This is precisely the appeal that should be strongest in the presentation of the senior Senator from Michigan. This proposal gives the Senate a reasonable opportunity to make the transition. As the Senator from Minnesota just remarked, it would not bring about the reduction forthwith.

I believe the Senator from Michigan has presented in a very effective fashion and quite realistically a reasonable request not alone of the Big Three, the favorite whipping boys of some of us, but also of Senators and their families who depend upon the output of the Big Three—now the Big Five—in transportation.

I hope the amendment will not be regarded as a gesture by two men from a single State and representing a single interest. I believe this situation affects all.

Mr. McNAMARA. I thank my colleague. The amendment not only affects Members of the Senate and their families, but consumers generally, because nearly everyone uses an automobile to some extent.

I am happy to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It is my understanding that the Senator from Michigan uses as the basis for his argument the contention that this tax should be reduced in the manner in which he suggests because the bill now pending before us provides that in 1962 the excise tax on automobiles and automobile accessories, of $802 million, as shown on page 7 of the committee report, should be taken out of the general fund and put into the highway trust fund. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. McNAMARA. Substantially. I do not have the figures before me, but I am sure they are correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The inference is that if the Finance Committee says that $802 million should be taken out of the general fund and put into the highway trust fund, that demonstrates we no longer need the money in the general fund.

Mr. McNAMARA. The Senator is saying what I said in other words just a few minutes ago.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Suppose we do need it in the general fund? What if we ought to be paying off part of our debt, and what if we ought to put our fiscal conditions in a sound position so that people would be willing to buy our bonds. Should we then eliminate this step?

Mr. McNAMARA. I answer the Senator in this way. We could do it in no more unfair way than to continue this system or reinstitute it, as the Senator suggests. I suggest that we do it through our income tax system, under which everybody pays in proportion to his earnings or income.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I can understand the position of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. McNAMARA. No matter how we cut it, this tax is unfair and should be taken care of.

Mr. LAUSCHE. My concern is the fiscal plight in which we find ourselves.

I do not agree with the budget director or with the committee that at present we are in a fiscal position to take $802 million out of the general fund in 1962 and put it into the highway trust fund.

Mr. McNAMARA. That is another argument.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That is another argument.

Mr. McNAMARA. I yield the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I desire to vote. I shall be very brief. By the terms of the bill, 5 percent of the tax is to be diverted to the highway fund. The Senator from Michigan, with zeal for a great industry in his State, would take the other 5 percent and forgive it. That is a withdrawal of $1,300 million a year from the Federal Treasury, and that is a substantial amount of money.

Mr. McNAMARA. It has actually happened.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; we are going to forgive 5 percent and divert 5 percent.

Mr. McNAMARA. My amendment affects only one half of that amount. Let us be fair.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not arguing with the Senator from Michigan as to what his amendment involves.

Mr. McNAMARA. I believe the Senator is being unfair with respect to the amendment before the Senate.

Mr. ANDERSON. The bill already takes out $650 million. The Senator would take out the other $650 million, and the difference is $1,300,000,000. I did not intend to be unfair to the Senator from Michigan.

I point out also that revenue bills originate in the House of Representatives, and while it is true the Senate may vote to change completely by an excise tax of this nature, those Senators who have served in the House, particularly those of us who have served on the Ways and Means Committee of the House, know how that action would be resisted by the House of Representatives. I suggest that this is a poor time to do it, and the amendment ought to be defeated.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, what I wish to say has nothing to do with the bill before us, but if Congress wants to cut taxes, there is one way to do it and that is to stop spending money. This proposal represents a $650 million tax cut in the face of a deficit in the period in which the reduction is proposed. I say the amendment should be overwhelmingly defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McNAMARA]. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. Were he present and voting, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea." I therefore withhold my vote.

The rollcall was concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. McGEE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH] is absent on official business attending the Interparliamentary Union Conference in Warsaw, Poland.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. McGEE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] would each vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] is absent on official business attending the Interparliamentary Union Conference in Warsaw, Poland.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] are necessarily absent.

The pair of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has been previously announced.

If present and voting, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 7, nays 78, as follows:

So Mr. MCNAMARA's amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MCCARTHY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which is at the clerk's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire the amendment to be read?

Mr. MCCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed, without reading. I can explain it in a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment offered by Mr. MCCARTHY is as follows:

On page 12, line 16, strike all through line 9, page 13, and insert the following:

"SEC. 202. Transfers to Highway Trust Fund.

"(a) TRANSFERS.—Section 209(c) of the Highway Revenue Act of 1956 (relating to transfer to Highway Trust Fund of amounts equivalent to certain taxes) is amended by renumbering paragraphs (2) and (3) as paragraphs (3) and (4), respectively, and by inserting after paragraph (1) the following new paragraph:

"'(2) EXCISE TAX ON PASSENGER AUTOMOBILES, ETC.—There is hereby appropriated to the Trust Fund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, amounts equivalent to—

"'(A) that portion of the taxes received in the Treasury after June 30, 1959, and before July 1, 1961, under section 4061(a)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (tax on passenger automobiles, etc.) which is equal to the amount which would have been so received if the tax rate under such section had been 2½ percent in lieu of the applicable rate; and

"'(B) that portion of the taxes received in the Treasury after June 30, 1961, and before July 1, 1964, under section 4061(a)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (tax on passenger automobiles, etc.) which is equal to the amount which would have been so received if the tax rate under such section had been 6 percent in lieu of the applicable rate.'"

At the end of the bill add a new section as follows:

"SEC. 203. Repeal of credit against income tax for dividends received by individuals.

"(a) REPEAL OF SECTION 34.—Effective with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1958, section 34 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credit for dividends received by individuals) is repealed.

"(b) TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS.—

"(1) The table of sections for part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by striking out

"'Sec. 34. Dividends received by individuals.'

"(2) Section 35(b)(1) of such Code is amended by striking out 'the sum of the credits allowable under sections 33 and 34' and inserting in lieu thereof 'the credit allowable under section 33'.

"(3) Section 37(a) of such Code is amended by striking out 'section 34 (relating to credit for dividends received by individuals),'.

"(4) Section 584(c)(2) of such Code is amended by striking out 'section 34 or'.

"(5) Section 642(a) of such Code is amended by striking out the first sentence, and by striking out 'section 34 and' in the second sentence.

"(6) Section 702(a)(5) of such Code is amended by striking out 'a credit under section 34,'.

"(7) Section 854(a) of such Code is amended by striking out 'section 34(a) (relating to credit for dividends received by individuals),'.

"(8) Section 854(b) of such Code is amended by striking out 'the credit under section 34(a),' in paragraph (1) and by striking out 'the credit under section 34,' in paragraph (2).

"(9) Section 1375(b) of such Code is amended by striking out 'section 34, section 37, or section 116' and inserting in lieu thereof 'section 37 or 116'.

"(10) Section 6014(a) of such Code is amended by striking out '34 or'.

"(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsection (b) shall apply only with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1958."

Mr. MCCARTHY. Mr. President, this amendment would accomplish three purposes. It accepts the 1-cent-a-gallon gasoline tax increase, and would earmark it for the highway trust fund. It would repeal the dividend credit. It would transfer funds collected from excise taxes which are imposed upon highway users, and which are not now earmarked for the trust fund, to the trust fund in the amount of 2½ percent in 1960, 2½ percent in 1961, and 6 percent in the following years, so that the highway trust fund would be solvent.

Those who are concerned about fiscal responsibility can be assured that the adoption of this amendment would bring additional revenue into the General Treasury. Those who are concerned about the continuation of the highway program would be assured that the amendment would provide adequate funds to continue the program according to the schedule now proposed.

That is the purpose and the effect of my amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MCCARTHY. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Do I correctly understand that the Senator's amendment would transfer a sufficient amount of funds from the general fund to the highway trust fund to prevent a default to the States?

Mr. MCCARTHY. The Senator is quite correct.

Mr. GORE. It would bring more money into the general fund than would be transferred from the general fund?

Mr. MCCARTHY. The Senator is quite correct. There would be a $20 million to $30 million a year increase in the funds going into the general fund of the Treasury. The amendment would provide for applying the 1-cent increase in the gasoline tax which is recommended by the committee to the highway trust fund, and for a transfer of 2½ percent of the other excise taxes which are not now allocated, for 1959 and 1960, and, following that, a 6 percent transfer, which is now provided.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY].

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, perhaps other Senators know what the amendment provides. I do not. I should like to ask a number of questions. I hope Senators will indulge me.

First of all, the Senator's amendment subscribes to the 1-cent gasoline tax increase?

Mr. MCCARTHY. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That would produce, as I understand, $560 million in 1 year?

Mr. MCCARTHY. In the full year 1961; that is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator also proposes to eliminate the dividend credit?

Mr. MCCARTHY. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Which would produce about $335 million?

Mr. MCCARTHY. Three hundred and thirty-five million dollars, which would go into the general revenues of the Treasury.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That would be $560 million plus $335 million?

Mr. MCCARTHY. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Eight hundred and ninety-five million dollars. What is the other 2½ percent?

Mr. MCCARTHY. The 2½ percent is a transfer from the automobile excise tax fund into the highway trust fund. In other words, revenue derived as a result of the repeal of the dividend credit would go into the general fund.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I understand.

Mr. MCCARTHY. But we would take the 2½ percent from the automobile excise taxes, which are now in general revenues.

Mr. LAUSCHE. How much would that produce?

Mr. McCARTHY. About $300 million a year.

Mr. LAUSCHE. So into the highway trust fund would go the 1 penny gasoline tax increase, or $560 million?

Mr. McCARTHY. Plus about $300 million.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That would be $860 million?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Would anything else go into the highway trust fund?

Mr. McCARTHY. I would add nothing more to what now goes into the highway trust fund.

Mr. LAUSCHE. While the Senator proposes to take out $300 million, through the 2½ percent provision, from the general fund, he proposes to put in how much?

Mr. McCARTHY. Approximately $335 million.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Treasury would be better off by about $35 million, and the highway trust fund could be kept current. The Bureau of Public Roads could meet all its commitments to the States, according to the present schedule.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it is with some regret that I impose myself further upon the Senate to express my views. I feel very deeply that a working relationship between the Federal Government and the States, which has persisted honorably and cooperatively since 1916, will be breached unless the Congress in some way provides sufficient funds to prevent the highway trust fund from being in default. I have attempted to do this in two different ways. The Senate declined to accept an amendment which I offered 2 months ago, and the Senate has now declined to accept the amendment which I have offered this evening. I accept the decision of the Senate.

Mr. President, I am prepared to support the pending amendment. Regretful as I am to endorse the 1-cent increase in the gasoline tax, the amendment now before us would not only keep the highway trust fund intact and provide funds to keep our highway program on schedule, but it would do that which neither of my amendments would have done—it would provide additional revenue to the Treasury of the United States over and above amounts to be transferred to the trust fund.

I plead with the Senate to agree to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McCARTHY]. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILEY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay"; if I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

The rollcall was concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. McGEE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are absent because of illness.

I further anounce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH] is absent on official business attending the Interparliamentary Meeting in Warsaw, Poland.

On this vote, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. If present and voting, the Senator from Massachusetts would vote "yea," and the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS]. If present and voting, the Senator from Indiana would vote "yea," and the Senator from Florida would vote "nay."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. McGEE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] would each vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] is absent on official business attending the Interparliamentary Union Conference at Warsaw, Poland.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is detained on official business.

The pair of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has been previously announced.

If present and voting, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA] would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. If present and voting, the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "nay," and the Senator from Massachusetts would vote "yea."

So Mr. McCARTHY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. GORE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL].

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], and myself, I offer an amendment, on page 3 of the bill, line 12, to the bottom of the page, strike out section 106; and on page 4, strike out the remainder of section 106, from line 1 to 10, inclusive.

Mr. President, I can summarize very briefly in one sentence what this is about. Then I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

The purpose of the amendment is to eliminate from the bill a provision which would weaken the Federal highway roadside protection standards which were adopted in 1958.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I shall try to be very brief.

Last year the Senate Public Works Committee held extensive hearings that continued for weeks, on the question of protecting our interstate highways from billboards and affording machinery whereby State governments, on their own initiative, could enter into voluntary and cooperative agreements with the United States Government to protect scenery and safety along our 41,000 miles of interstate highways. After extensive hearings and prolonged debate in the Senate, an amendment sponsored jointly by the able senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] and myself was adopted. It was accepted by the House and it was included in the bill which was signed by President Eisenhower.

I emphasize what happened yesterday in the Senate Public Works Committee, of which I am a member. In less than 10 minutes, without hearing any witnesses, either from the administration or the public, the Public Works Committee adopted an amendment which would automatically exclude all areas in municipalities, and areas State-zoned as industrial or commercial, from application of these national policies.

We heard no witnesses from the public. We heard no witnesses from the national administration.

I suggest to Senators that they examine the minority views in the report on the bill, Calendar No. 934. They will find therein a letter dated June 18 from the Under Secretary of Commerce, who is now the Secretary of Commerce, opposing very vigorously, on behalf of the administration, an identical bill which was before the House of Representatives. Yet our committee acted and included this amendment in the bill before us without even hearing the departmental views and learning why the Department of Commerce opposes this measure so vigorously.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it not true, however, that the language retained in the bill is a clarification of what Congress intended to do in the prior act?

Mr. NEUBERGER. It certainly is not my opinion that Congress intended to do that. I was one of the sponsors of the language that was adopted last year. I did not have the impression that we intended to automatically exclude all these areas.

I ask the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], who was a sponsor with me, if that was his idea of what we were adopting at that time.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly it should not be in the province of the Federal Government to determine matters which are clearly a zoning power or a judicial power. I do not have the figures, but if this provision is stricken out, it will add to the cost of that portion of the program.

Mr. NEUBERGER. We consulted with the Bureau of Public Roads today and found that not a single State has asked for exclusion under this provision.

Today we are seeking to continue the policy of leaving it to the States to determine whether they want to exclude municipal areas or State-zoned industrial and commercial areas.

I call attention to the language of the Department of Commerce, in a letter signed by the present Secretary of Commerce, indicating that in certain Eastern States virtually the entire interstate system would be excluded from the Federal highway beautification standards.

Mr. CURTIS. But merely transferring that prerogative to the States would not meet the problem, because there are cities in the States which have home rule charters. So the question is entirely up to the municipalities to determine. The language of the bill would leave the decision and the responsibility with the municipalities. Certainly they are interested in the appearance of their highways. They have the power of zoning. That is a responsibility which the Federal Government should not take on.

Mr. NEUBERGER. To begin with, we should not take any such fundamental step without hearing witnesses. I have received telegrams protesting this action from numerous influential groups representing hundreds of individuals throughout the United States. I ask unanimous consent that typical examples be printed at this point in the record.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
September 5, 1959.

Hon. RICHARD NEUBERGER,
Senate Office Building:

National Council of State Garden Clubs representing over 400,000 members in 47 federated States opposes Kerr billboard amendment in Highway bill H.R. 8678. We urge your best effort to obtain public hearing on Kerr amendment.

MRS. C. D. SHOEMAKER,
Legislative Committee, National Council, State Garden Club.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
September 5, 1959.

Hon. RICHARD NEUBERGER,
Senate Office Building:

Confusion and much difficulty would result from inclusion of billboard provision in highway bill without hearing. Important that it be eliminated to allow careful consideration of serious issue.

MRS. VANCE HOOD,
Chairman, National Roadside Committee.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
September 5, 1959.

Hon. RICHARD NEUBERGER,
Senate Office Building:

The members of the American Association of Nurserymen opposed to Kerr amendment to billboard control legislation passed last year, reported from committee without hearings. We would have appeared in opposition to Kerr amendment if given opportunity. Regulation of billboards within areas embraced by Kerr amendment is important for safety as in other areas. We represent nursery firms, over 1,700, in 47 States. Opposition to Kerr amendment universal.

RICHARD P. WHITE,
President, American Association of Nurserymen.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
September 5, 1959.

Hon. RICHARD NEUBERGER,
Senate Office Building:

Inclusion of billboard provision in highway bill would be seriously crippling. Should be subject of careful hearing. Hope you can have it removed.

RICHARD W. WESTWOOD,
President, American Nature Association.

MOUNT KISCO, N.Y.,
September 5, 1959.

Senator DICK NEUBERGER:
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

The Garden Club of America strongly opposes the Kerr proposal which if left in the highway bill would have crippling effect on billboard legislation passed last year. My organization feels this drastic measure should not be included without hearings being held on the same and requests the opportunity to testify at such as to the adverse effects of the Kerr proposal. Above all we feel that it is a violation of States rights in that it deprives these States of its own right of determining the areas to be included in any Federal-State agreement.

MRS. THOMAS M. WALLER,
Conservation Chairman, Garden Club of America.

MEDIA, PA., September 5, 1959.

Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

The Penna. Road Side Council speaks for over a million Pennsylvanians in protesting any amendment to the Federal billboard control law—our legislators in Washington have been informed of our strong opposition.

HILDA FOX,
Chairman, Executive Committee, Pennsylvania Road Side Council.

WEEKAPAUG, R.I.,
September 5, 1959.

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
Senate Building, Washington, D.C.:

National Council State Garden Clubs urges your assistance in calling for public hearing on Senator KERR's amendment to H.R. 8678 nullifying progress made by Highway Act of 1958.

CLAIRE M. STIEFF,
Chairman of Legislation.

BALTIMORE, MD.,
September 5, 1959.

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

Following wire sent to Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ: "Federated Garden Clubs of Maryland, Inc., with membership of over 4,000 bitterly oppose Kerr amendment to the Fallon roadside control bill, H.R. 5950, and stress the importance of a public hearing."

MRS. RICHARD N. WILLS,
President.

Mr. NEUBERGER. The Secretary of Commerce is opposed to this provision. We did not even hear from him or his associates in the Bureau of Public Roads.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Is it not true that the cities derive their power of zoning from the States?

Mr. NEUBERGER. Certainly. It is a delegated power. Cities are not sovereign. They have only such powers as are delegated to them by States and counties.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Do I correctly understand that the Eisenhower administration is opposed to the action of the committee which the Senator from Oregon now seeks to set aside?

Mr. NEUBERGER. If Frederick H. Mueller, Under Secretary of Commerce, in vigorous, forthright language, speaks for the Eisenhower administration, then certainly the administration is opposed to the action of the committee.

Mr. CLARK. Is not Mr. Mueller at present the Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. NEUBERGER. He is now. When he wrote the letter on June 18, he was Under Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator consider this action by the committee as a turning of its back on what Congress did last year with respect to billboards?

Mr. NEUBERGER. It is a turning of its back on what Congress did last year without giving that provision any valid opportunity to function.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator believe that the action taken by the Committee on Public Works was a violation of the principle of States rights?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I think it was. I think discretion in this matter should be left to the States.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator feel that it is a violation of sound legislative procedure to reverse the action of Congress taken last year, without proper justification for such action?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I certainly do, without hearing from public or administration witnesses.

Mr. CLARK. In the opinion of the Senator from Oregon, is the billboard lobby behind this action?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I cannot say for a certainty, but I believe that if the Senate retains this language in the bill, the billboard lobby will not be unhappy.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from Oregon for his courtesy.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I believe this language should remain in the bill. After all, the Federal highway program is costly enough as it is. Extension of the power of the Federal Government to clear the areas adjacent to highways in municipalities is a burden which the Federal Government should not take on.

Furthermore, it was the intent of Congress in the earlier act that certain powers be granted to the States. In the States where cities are granted home-rule charters, we cannot carry out what was contemplated in the House language by excepting interstate highways going through municipalities.

I certainly believe we should not strike out this provision without knowing what additional costs will be incurred by reason of such action. The committee has placed the language in the bill. The amendment ought to be rejected.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, the committee did not reverse the action of Congress; it confirmed the action of Congress. The amendment provides specifically what the sponsors of the legislation last year told us their proposal would do.

The committee had witnesses before it. I shall call them to the witness stand here and now for the Senate. First I quote the distinguished senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL]. When he introduced his bill in 1958, in a statement of national policy he specifically covered the main traveled way and all portions of the Interstate System outside incorporated municipalities. In that connection, the Senator from California pointed out—and I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 101, part 2, page 1547:

> The State of California, under its Constitution, can exercise its authority in the field of property use only in the areas of my State which lie outside incorporated municipalities.

Now I shall call the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] to the witness stand. He testified on the bill in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 104, part 4, page 5097. A cosponsor of the bill, he then said:

> We would not want the Federal Government to intrude upon the right and prerogatives of the officials of the States of California and Oregon.

I now call to the stand again the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], who said in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 104, part 4, page 5105.

> By reason of the problem created by home rule communities, the bill recognizes that under any agreement between the Federal Government and a State, incorporated communities which exercise home rule authority shall be excluded.

I now call to the witness stand the distinguished junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON], who was one of those who participated in this action last year. He said in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 104, part 4, page 5377:

> As has already been pointed out, the provisions in the bill relating to billboard advertising are essentially restricted to the portions of the Interstate Highway System which are outside the commercial areas, outside the metropolitan areas, and outside the areas which are within the incorporated towns, where advertising is already permitted and in many cases, if not in most cases, already controlled by local and State regulation.

Mr. President, I call again to the witness stand the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], who said in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 104, part 4, page 5099:

> The heavy right-of-way acquisition costs are in cities and other heavily populated, commercial, or industrial areas. These, as I have said, may be eliminated from the agreements with the States. Obviously, for example, it would not make sense for a State to purchase billboard-control rights out to 660 feet from both edges of a highway right-of-way that passes between the high, narrow walls of warehouses, or factories of an urban industrial area.

Now I can call the Senator from California to the witness stand; I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 104, part 2, page 1547:

> From a practical standpoint, therefore, the interstate mileage located within cities is not of the highest importance when we think of beautification. Indeed, I venture to suggest that much of the interstate mileage within cities will traverse industrial areas and business or commercial districts which would not present an opportunity to preserve scenic beauty, and which probably would present little opportunity to create it.

Now I call to the witness stand the then Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Weeks, who, when he appeared before the Public Works Committee on March 18, 1957, said—as shown on page 3 of the hearings on Senate bill 963:

> State and local zoning laws would be recognized by permitting advertising in areas actually zoned industrial or commercial.

A member of the committee then asked him this question:

> You do not contemplate inclusion of municipal areas within the areas to which the standards are applicable?

Secretary Weeks replied:

> As I see it, we would not control advertising in business, industrial, or manufacturing areas or land zoned for those purposes. There would be no reason for it.

At the same hearing, Mr. Tallamy, then and now the Director of the Bureau of Public Roads, in the Department of Commerce, said:

> If the State, through State zoning, or if the local communities, through their own zoning powers, have zoned those areas for commercial or industrial purposes, then, under this proposal, outdoor advertising would be permitted.

So, Mr. President, I repeat that in referring to the language of the bill, the committee was not reversing the position taken by Congress; instead, the committee was confirming the action taken by the Congress.

The committee did not act without witnesses. It had before it witnesses of the highest dignity and standing. It had the authors of the legislation. It had the Secretary of Commerce, who sponsored the legislation. It had the Director of the Bureau of Public Roads, under whose management the program was put into operation.

Without exception, those witnesses—of great dignity and prestige and influence and position—confirmed what was in the mind of the Congress and in the minds of the sponsors of the legislation when the bill was enacted last year.

It was the purpose of the committee only to clarify and reaffirm what the authors said we were doing, what the Secretary of Commerce said we were doing, what the Director of the Bureau of Public Roads said we were doing, and what the Members of the Senate understood they were doing when they passed the bill which resulted in this legislation.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Were any one of the statements the Senator from Oklahoma has read to the Senate tonight called to the attention of the committee during the 10 minutes it considered this issue?

Mr. KERR. My good friend was there during those 10 minutes. He knew the pressure under which we were operating. I must say to him that the statements to which I have referred were made in his presence, and some were made by him; and I am sure the other members of the committee had the same resourcefulness that I had——

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma has not answered my question. He said we had before us in the committee witnesses of the highest character.

Mr. KERR. I did.

Mr. NEUBERGER. We had no witnesses.

Mr. KERR. But I read to the Senate tonight their names and what they said.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Yes; the Senator read that to the Senate tonight. But yesterday at the committee meeting, the Senator from Oklahoma did not read to the committee any statements by anyone. Those are only the Senator's interpretations——

Mr. KERR. Oh, no; I read the exact words; I read them from the RECORD. I read the words used by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma say he read them to the committee, on yesterday?

Mr. KERR. I read them to the Senate; the matter is now before the Senate.

Mr. NEUBERGER. The Senator from Oklahoma said the committee had before it witnesses of the highest character. When did the committee have such witnesses before it?

Mr. SALTONSTALL and Mr. KUCHEL addressed the Chair.

Mr. KERR. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question:

All of us are opposed to advertising on the interstate highways of the country. As I read the amendment, its purpose is to clarify what was done last year, so that in the municipalities and the industrial and commercial areas, when the interstate highways may pass through those areas in incorporated municipalities, the municipalities will be permitted to regulate the advertising in those areas.

Mr. KERR. The Senator from Massachusetts is correct. We were so careful that we limited the area affected by this amendment to that "now zoned," to those "now incorporated." We did not make the amendment broad enough to include areas which may hereafter be included in incorporated municipalities.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The language used in the amendment states that it applies only to industrial and commercial areas; is that correct?

Mr. KERR. That is correct.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If the legislative history which the Senator from Oklahoma has read to us shows so clearly that that was the intent, why should we specify it again, now?

Mr. KERR. Because the then Secretary of Commerce said that "State and local zoning laws would be recognized by permitting advertising in areas actually zoned industrial or commercial"; but in spite of the fact that he said that, and in spite of the fact that later he said, as I see it, that we would not control outdoor advertising in business, commercial, or industrial areas or on land zoned for those purposes, because there would be no reason to do so, they have since that time promulgated regulations, under that statute, whereby they are doing exactly what the sponsors of the legislation said they would not do, and what the Secretary of Commerce and the Director of the Bureau of Public Roads told the Committee on Public Works they would not do.

Mr. KUCHEL and Mr. COTTON addressed the Chair.

Mr. KERR. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, in view of the fact that my distinguished friend the Senator from Oklahoma, has brought my name into this controversy, I should like to suggest to him that when we considered this subject in the last Congress—as he will remember—it is perfectly true that it so happened that the junior Senator from New Hampshire offered an amendment which took out of the highways along which billboards would be regulated those highways located in areas where the Interstate System followed established rights of way where advertising was already exhibited.

So the restriction applied to the new, virgin highways being built throughout the country.

I am sure that that amendment enabled us to obtain sufficient votes to have the bill passed and to have the regulations go into effect.

But I say to the Senator from Oklahoma that it was the understanding at least of the Senator from New Hampshire, all through the period when we were considering the subject of billboard advertising, in the Public Works Committee, and later on the floor of the Senate, that the Federal Government would not endeavor to place a ban on billboard advertising in those portions of the Interstate System which were actually within the heavily commercial sections of cities.

But the language which has been placed in this bill tonight makes the Senator from New Hampshire apprehensive that when the restriction is excluded entirely from any portion of a highway within incorporated cities, the effect will be—particularly in New England and elsewhere in the eastern portion of the country—that there will be many miles of Interstate System Highways that will be out of sight of commercial areas and will be out of sight of factories; I refer to the miles and miles of such highways that will pass through the edge or the very perimeter of incorporated cities—and, immediately this provision takes effect, it will remove the restrictive provision and take it out of effect, even though the local inhabitants would desire to have the restrictive provision apply.

Mr. KERR. Does the Senator from New Hampshire have before him a copy of the bill?

Mr. COTTON. Yes.

Mr. KERR. I should like to have the Senator from New Hampshire turn to page 4, and examine the language in line 3.

Let me say that it is not our purpose to have what the Senator from New Hampshire fears, done.

I read now from line 3:

This section shall not apply to those segments of the Interstate System—

Insert the words—which traverse commercial or industrial zones within the existing boundaries of incorporated municipalities.

Would that eliminate the fear my friend has?

Mr. COTTON. If we are to legislate on the floor of the Senate, the concession my friend from Oklahoma has made would be very comforting to the Senator from New Hampshire. The Senator from Oklahoma knows how I value his sincerity, but in view of the fact that I sat for many long hours in the Committee on Public Works and noted the complete absence of solicitude on the part of the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma and others who are opposing the amendment tonight for the control of advertising, I am a little reluctant, after a few short minutes, to accept the suggestion as a safe provision to have in the bill on advertising control.

I was much impressed by the observation of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] when he asked a very pertinent question: If the language of the law is so clear already, what is the purpose of the amendment? In view of the fact that it was submitted by my friend from Oklahoma and others, who very sincerely and very ably opposed any kind of billboard control, I am still a little afraid that, even though the Senator is very generous in offering the amendment, and even though I would eagerly accept it, I would still like to see this provision stricken out.

Mr. President, despite the sincere assurances given by the Senator from Oklahoma, I must support the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER].

Mr. KERR. I ask the Senator to offer the amendment suggested, and on behalf of the managers of the bill I will accept it.

I say to the Senator from New Hampshire and to the Senate that I did oppose that part of the bill last year, but the Senate passed it, and the Secretary of Commerce and the Director of Highways told us that they understood it would not apply to zoned and commercial areas, but now they have promulgated regulations which are not consistent with that understanding, and it is our purpose to clarify the law. I shall be glad to accept the words which I read as an amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. COTTON. Will the Senator give us one example of the administration of this act in which the Department of Commerce and the Bureau of Public Roads have controlled advertising in an area which is commercial and in which there should not be control?

Mr. KERR. I say to my good friend from New Hampshire that the regulations are full of such instances. I do not have them before me, but I have examined them, and I say to him sincerely and correctly that the regulations have been issued, and they are not consistent with the position taken by the Secretary of Commerce. It is the purpose of the amendment only to clarify the law and carry out the will of Congress as stated last year and in accordance with the statement of its sponsors and the interpretation given it by the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, the able senior Senator from Oklahoma has called a number of witnesses to speak on behalf of his amendment. The fact that they speak, as it were, in absentia did not for a moment deter my able friend from abusing them and from endeavoring to frighten them. But I submit that the very best witnesses in favor of defeating the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma are the witnesses whom he called and whose testimony he read.

No one who had anything to do with billboard control legislation in the last Congress intended to give any Federal incentives to a State to beautify commercial or industrial areas which any segment of the Interstate Highway System traverses or was about to traverse.

The trouble with the language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma is that it is too all inclusive. For example, it begins, "This section shall not apply to those segments of the Interstate System," and so forth. What is "this section"? That is the entire section which deals with the language setting up Federal standards for States to follow if they wish to obtain the Federal incentive payments. It is a section which indicates to States that if they purchase rights-of-way along the path the Interstate System will traverse, there will be an incentive payment from the Government to them. Under the language of the Senator's amendment, the entire section would be eliminated so far as municipalities are concerned.

There are States in the Union which are called home-rule States. Senators know this better than I. In those States—and my State is one example—the cities have the right under their State constitutions to do anything they wish. Obviously the State of California could not enter into an agreement with the Federal Government to control what those cities should do. The constitutions of other States permit the State to declare what shall be zoned and what shall not be zoned, and in those areas surely we should not say in this legislation, as my friend from Oklahoma suggests, that all cities automatically should be cut out. I suggest if there is a problem—and there may well be—it would not be cured by the language of the Senator from Oklahoma. On that basis, I hope the Senate votes down the amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I shall speak only 2 or 3 minutes, I do so because I was in the committee when the vote on this amendment was taken, opposed it, and have joined in the amendment to strike it from the bill. As has been said, the vote was 8 to 6 in the committee to carry the amendment. As far as discussion of the amendment was concerned, less than 30 minutes was spent. There were no hearings. The amendment was adopted without hearing witnesses from the Federal agencies, the States, the municipalities, the areas concerned or interested organizations. It has been said the purpose of the amendment is to clarify provisions of the billboard law enacted last year. In my judgment—and I say this with deference to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma—it does not clarify the billboard law. It is a radical change in the law passed last year. I shall give my reasons for saying so.

The billboard amendment which was passed last year authorized the Federal Government to enter into cooperative arrangements with the States, to enable the States to take advantage of Federal roadside protection benefits. It was not mandatory upon the States that they should enter into such arrangements. But they could if they desired, enter into arrangements to protect the interstate highway roadsides from unsightly advertising. The effect of this amendment is to deny to the States, and to the communities, the opportunity to enter into any arrangements with the Federal Government to protect roadsides within municipalities, or any part of municipalities through which an interstate highway passes. The amendment excludes from the billboard and advertising legislation enacted last year. All of an interstate road within a municipality. It is a radical change, it is not a matter for the cities alone.

The Federal Government does have an interest in preventing advertising on interstate highways. It pays 90 percent of the money for interstate road construction. Secondly, a municipality should not be able to place a burden of unsightly advertising on interstate travel. Again, signs and billboards affect the safety of persons who use the roads.

The committee amendment takes all authority away from the Federal Government to protect roadsides within municipalities of whatever size. It takes authority away from the States. It leaves such authority wholly to municipalities. It is a radical change. That is the reason I opposed the provision in committee, and joined in the minority report.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I wish to address myself to the Senator from Oklahoma. If the Senator will look at line 6 on page 4, I think, on reading the language, he will agree that his amendment should, first of all, be amended so that the two words "where in" are one word. Otherwise, the amendment makes no sense.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLOTT. Would the Senator accept that amendment?

Mr. KERR. I would.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I am rather uninformed on this matter, but can a Senator, on the floor, accept an amendment to a bill on behalf of the entire Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that the Senate would have to vote on the amendment.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment, but I wanted it to make sense, in the event it is adopted; and in order to make sense, the two words "where in" on line 6, page 4, should be one word.

The sole argument for the billboard restriction, in my mind, is not solely one of unification; it is one of safety. The many hours we discussed the sizes of signs will be remembered. The proposal is to exempt industrial areas and municipalities, as they are described, while they still would be able to draw Federal money. Agreements may be entered into with the States, which in turn grant the municipalities whatever authority they may obtain. We offer the States incentives for restrictions as to signs, and yet it is proposed to exempt municipalities. I really think that not only is a question of ethical values involved, but if the amendment is adopted, I think it will increase problems in the highway system as it applies to municipalities.

For that reason I shall oppose the amendment. However, I do want to offer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed on page 4, line 6, to strike out the two words "where in" and insert in lieu thereof the one word "wherein."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, let me say that if the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is defeated, and I hope it will be, I will offer both that amendment and the one mentioned to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, do I correctly understand that the Senator from Colorado has withdrawn his amendment?

Mr. ALLOTT. No; it was ruled out of order.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK. A vote for the Neuberger amendment is a vote to delete the billboard provision which the Senator from Oklahoma has so clearly explained. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not place any interpretation upon amendments.

Mr. CLARK. A parliamentary inquiry, then. Is a "yea" vote on the Neuberger amendment a vote to strike from the bill the provision which has to do with billboards?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to advise the Senator from Pennsylvania that a "yea" vote would strike section 106 of the bill.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend, the Presiding Officer.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, as a member of the Public Works Committee, I worked on the so-called billboard legislation. It seems to me, in view of the record we are making this evening, this should be said. The Senator from Arkansas has asked the question, "What is the reason for clarification?" The answer is that a regulation has been promulgated by the Secretary of Commerce.

I can say to my colleagues that I have an interest in this legislation. I was almost the "swing" vote on this matter to get it out of committee.

My inforation is that no State has asked for an exclusion under this regulation since it was promulgated. That fact raises the question, What is the necessity for it? While I do not say it is improper, I do think it is highly inadvisable to make such a change in this important piece of legislation, which was so controversial such a short time ago, without having hearings; and I hope the amendment of the Senator from Oregon will be adopted.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I call to the attention of the Senate the fact that we consulted the Bureau of Public Roads as late as 6 o'clock this evening. They told us not one State had asked for exclusion of municipal areas under this act.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Has any action been taken on the Allott amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No action has been taken on the Allott amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is the amendment not in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the Allott amendment.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I have not withdrawn it. I was told it was out of order. I offer it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, there has been no such ruling, has there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not out of order. The question is on——

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to withdraw his amendment for this reason: If the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is agreed to, the section is out of the bill. If it is not agreed to, the Senator from Oklahoma has said he will join the Senator from Colorado in offering the amendment.

Mr. ALLOTT. I have no objection to withdrawing it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Oregon. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. So Mr. NEUBERGER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, on page 4, line 6, as suggested by the Senator from Colorado, to correct what is clearly a typographical error, where the words "where in" are shown as two words instead of one. I offer an amendment for the word "wherein" to be shown as one word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, beginning at line 3, page 4, with the words "this section shall not apply to those segments of the Interstate System," I offer an amendment to add the words, as I suggested to the Senator from New Hampshire, "which traverse commercial or industrial zones," before the words, "within the presently existing boundaries of incorporated municipalities."

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma restate those words?

Mr. KERR. Between lines 4 and 5 add the words "which traverse commercial or industrial zones."

Mr. HOLLAND. After the word "System"?

Mr. KERR. Yes, and before the word "within".

Mr. HART rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. KERR. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HART. The Senator from California, who supported the Neuberger amendment, emphasized the opening words "This section" as meaning the section in its entirety shall not apply to these industrial areas. I wonder if it is true that "This section" includes items others than regulation of advertising.

Mr. KERR. If the Senator thinks it does I will offer a corrective amendment on that as soon as this amendment is acted upon.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. COTTON. I thank the Senator for offering the amendment. This will clarify the matter and go far to guard against the things the Senator from New Hampshire feared with regard to the outer perimeters of an incorporated city.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, in order that there may be no doubt about the question raised by the Senator from Michigan, on page 4, line 3 before the word "This" I offer an amendment to read as follows:

Agreements entered into between the Secretary of Commerce and State highway departments under

In other words, instead of the language being "This section shall not apply," it would clearly state that the amendment refers only to "Agreements entered into between the Secretary of Commerce and State highway departments under this section."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I offer, for myself, my colleague [Mr. GORE], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], the amendment which is at the desk, and I ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, after line 15, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

"Sec. 108. Increase in amount authorized for bridges over Federal dams.

That subsection (d) of section 320 of title 23, United States Code, entitled "Highways", is amended by striking out "$10,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$13,000,000."

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, it was the idea of the committee and the committee itself that this should be brought up by separate legislation. However, I believe we will be justified in taking it to conference anyway, and I will accept the amendment if it meets the approval of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, am I in order if I make a brief statement on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is in order. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to have the bill go to third reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I shall be very brief. In fact, I shall insert most of my remarks in the RECORD.

I think it is well known to the Senate that I am opposed to any increase whatsoever in the gasoline tax. I am opposed to Federal sales taxes. I am opposed to oppressive taxes.

Mr. President, I think that taxes ought to be based on ability to pay. The question is raised as to how would the Senator from Oregon raise the money needed for Government services. Would he increase the income tax? To those suggesting that an increase in the income taxes is something unthinkable and horrible, my answer is I would increase the income tax if that is the alternative to increasing sales taxes.

Mr. President, I would eliminate the loopholes in the present tax structure, many of which this body itself helped create in 1954.

Mr. President, I would make great savings in the foreign aid program, by which we are wasting hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars and not helping improve America's foreign relations.

I would come to grips, Mr. President, with that type of waste.

I would seek to bring some benefits to our own people in order to strengthen our own economy in time, Mr. President, while we still have the time to win this great fight for peace and freedom. We cannot do it, Mr. President, if we continue to impose further and further taxes in this country not based upon ability to pay, but pass the burden onto the backs of people least able to pay, as is, once again, being done in this proposed legislation.

It is difficult to obtain figures which show just who pays the gasoline tax, and in what proportion to the total income of the taxpayer.

But I have obtained from the Library of Congress the "Study of Consumers Expenditures for 1956," which throws a lot of light on the regressiveness of the gasoline tax.

The "Study of Consumer Expenditures" shows the amount of income spent on gasoline and motor oil by income group, ranging from those families with incomes under $2,000 a year to those with incomes of $10,000 a year and over.

They show that in 1956, families with incomes under $2,000 a year spent $79 for gas and oil for their cars, or 7.9 percent of their income; families with $2,000 to $3,000 spent $124 or 4.9 percent; the group from $3,000 to $4,000 spent $147, or 4.2 percent; from $4,000 to $5,000 spent $168, or 3.7 percent; the group from $5,000 to $7,000 spent $190, or 3.2 percent; and the families having incomes ranging from $7,000 to $10,000 spent $205 for gas and oil, or 2.4 percent of their income.

Mr. ANDERSON. May we have order, please, Mr. President?

SEVERAL SENATORS. May we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Oregon may proceed.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the Federal gasoline tax bears a reasonable ratio to the expenditure on gas and oil, although the quality of the gasoline purchased would make some difference. One must take into consideration, too, the heavy tax which many States also levy upon gasoline.

Although the total amount spent for these items goes up with income, it does not go up nearly as fast as income, and hence becomes a smaller percentage of the higher incomes.

Mr. President, it has been my opinion since this debate first started that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], has been a great statesman and leader on this issue. I have followed him in most particulars in regard to it. I am sorry to see tonight that the Senate is voting to press this yoke of a regressive Federal sales tax upon the gasoline users of this country. I fear it also from the standpoint of its precedential implications. It is another move to get a little bit more of the camel's body under the tent.

Mr. President, we have to take a much firmer stand than we are taking in Congress against the ever increasing trend toward a Federal sales tax. I have had something to say on this subject on different occasions in the past. On August 26, 1959, in a radio statement broadcast in my State I discussed the Federal gasoline tax problem. I ask unanimous consent that it may be included in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RADIO BROADCAST OF SENATOR WAYNE MORSE, AUGUST 26, 1959

Fellow Oregonians, one of the hottest issues of the closing weeks of this session of Congress is the one shaping up over how to finance the Federal highway program which was authorized in the Highway Act of 1956.

You will recall that in that act of 3 years ago, a new Interstate Highway System was authorized, for which the Federal Government would pay 90 percent of the cost and the States 10 percent. This network is to be in addition to the regular primary, secondary, and urban roads to which the Federal Government already contributes.

At the same time, it was provided that these new roads would be paid for through highway use taxes which were imposed or increased, and which were to go into a new highway trust fund. Of course, many highway use taxes were already in existence. There was an excise tax on new cars, taxes on trucks, auto accessories, and a 2 cents a gallon sales tax on gasoline. In 1956, the gasoline tax was raised to 3 cents, and the entire 3 cents, plus some new taxes on tires, trucks, and diesel fuel were diverted into the highway trust fund.

I had many reservations about this type of financing, which I expressed at the time. But all objections were overridden in the interest of getting the new roads under construction.

Early last year, when the sharp recession of late 1957 and 1958 was underway, the Congress ordered a speedup in the entire highway construction program in order to keep industry busy and to keep men at work. But the result was that construction proceeded faster than the trust fund collections provided for. Because the Highway Act required—mistakenly, in my opinion—that these roads be paid for with trust fund collections only, work on them has come to a halt in several States, including Oregon.

Now the administration, which insisted upon the trust fund financing of these roads in 1956, is insisting that the gasoline tax be raised again so construction may continue. But in making this plea, the administration spokesmen avoid telling you, the motorist the whole story. Part of what they avoid mentioning is that not all the highway use taxes were diverted into the highway trust fund in 1956. In fact there are additional taxes upon motorists amounting to a total of $1½ billion which go into the general Treasury and not into the trust fund at all. So the trust fund gets only $2 billion of the roughly $3½ billion which truckers and motorists pay for the privilege of getting behind the wheel of an automobile.

These other taxes are the 10-percent sales tax on new cars, the sales tax on lubricating oil for your car, the sales tax on auto parts and accessories, and part of the tax on trucks and buses.

So the real issue is not just whether highway users should pay for new highways, but whether they should pay for new highways and for other services of Government, too. As I did in 1956, I take the view that good roads are not a special service provided only for the comfort and ease of those who drive, but are a service to the entire community and all who live and do business in it. For example, every time Congress is asked to finance the foreign aid program for another year, administration spokesmen come before us to request hundreds of millions of dollars in funds to build highway systems in the underdeveloped countries of Asia and Africa. They are justified on the ground that a road system is vital to their economies, to the promotion of their business activity, of commerce, and trade. But unfortunately, the administration does not take that view of roads here at home. Here at home, the President wants new roads to be charged to those who actually travel on them, regardless of the benefits in trade and business they promote for the manufacturer, the hotel owner, the garages, and oil companies who profit from truck and auto traffic.

That is why I am stanchly opposed to this request that the gasoline tax be raised again, this time from 3 cents per gallon to 4½ cents. I regard it as unfair for three reasons: First, other highway taxes are going into the Treasury; second, roads are not of benefit and profit solely to those who use them, and in the same proportion; and third, the gasoline tax is a regressive sales tax which runs exactly counter to the principle of ability to pay taxation.

To take the first of these objections, I believe that until all highway use taxes go into the trust fund, there is no reason to raise the gasoline tax. If it is really as important as the administration says it is that motorists and trucks finance the new roads, then all of those particular taxes should go into highway construction. Therefore, I am supporting proposals made by Senator GORE, of Tennessee, Senate author of the Highway Act of 1956, to divert these other highway taxes into the trust fund, along with the gasoline tax.

My second objection is to the whole principle that only road users should pay for the roads. How much profit do you suppose the businessmen, manufacturers, and service industries of your town or city would lose, if all the roads in your town or city and all the roads connecting with other towns and cities suddenly disappeared? If you can imagine that situation, you have an idea of the stake which our whole economy has in the highway system. That is why I believe roads, like other services of Government, should be financed by general taxation. Diversion of present highway use taxes out of the Treasury, or general appropriations from the Treasury would both accomplish that objective.

Third, I am opposed to the trend toward consumer sales taxes which this pressure for a higher gasoline tax represents. When you hear the argument that taxes must be raised when expenditures are raised in order to keep the budget in balance, be sure you find out just whose taxes it is that are planned to be raised. In my opinion, the basic and most important standard in levying taxes is the standard of ability to pay. Does the tax take the most from those who have the most wealth? Or does it take a larger percentage of income from the little fellow? Where a particular service is involved which is of value almost exclusively to the customer, then it is appropriate to charge reasonable fees; but for general services which benefit the entire community or Nation, then I believe they should be paid for on the basis of ability to pay.

Consumer sales taxes, like the telephone and transportation tax, as well as the gasoline tax, are what economists call "regressive," because they take a larger percentage income from a small income than they do from a big income. They are not even what are called "proportionate" taxes, because a proportionate tax takes the same percentage of everyone's income. At the other end of the scale are the "progressive" taxes, which take the largest percentage from the largest incomes. Our Federal income tax is a progressive tax, and is a true ability to pay tax.

There are plenty of loopholes in the ability to pay taxes which should be closed before we talk about raising money from more sales taxes. For example, a few weeks ago the Senate voted by a fairly large margin to close the loophole which gives favored tax treatment to personal income from dividends. This dividend income loophole was created in 1954 by the Eisenhower administration when it had a Republican majority in Congress. This year, the Senate tried to close it, and to gain for the Treasury $335 million a year in revenue.

But the administration was the leading opponent of that proposal, just as it has been an opponent of the efforts some of us have been making in Congress to reduce or repeal the depletion allowance for oil and gas companies. Because of this opposition by the administration, the House of Representatives did not approve our repeal of the dividend income loophole.

By its opposition to these efforts to increase revenue on the basis of ability to pay, and its insistence upon increasing revenue through more sales taxes, the administration reveals that its real interest is in shifting the tax burden off the upper brackets and onto the lower and middle income groups. Watch for new sales tax proposals to be pushed, if the pressure of the administration for a boost in the gasoline tax succeeds.

I pledge to you that I shall not be a party to these efforts.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in a recent newsletter to my mailing list I discussed the subject of "Dispute Over Gasoline Tax Continues." I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DISPUTE OVER GASOLINE TAX CONTINUES

The House of Representatives, which must originate tax legislation, is still split over the financing of the highway program. At one time, its tax committee agreed to 1 cent of the 1½ cents a gallon boost requested by the administration. But a proposal to raise it one-half cent and also use for highways some of the 10 percent automobile sales tax which now goes into the Treasury is also under consideration.

Whatever proposal comes to the Senate floor, I shall continue to work for allocation of some of the other auto taxes to roadbuilding, or general appropriations for it. Motor taxes should not be expected to support both roadbuilding and other services of Government. General services of Government should be paid for with taxes based on ability to pay. Sales taxes are just the opposite. They are called "regressive," because they take a bigger percentage of the little fellow's income than of the big fellow's.

The telephone tax, transportation tax, and gas tax are good examples of regressive sales taxes levied upon necessities. They are not even proportionate, because proportionate taxes take the same percentage of everyone's income. Our Federal income tax is progressive, because it takes a larger percentage as income goes up. It is a true ability to pay tax.

Actually, I share the view of Senator GORE, of Tennessee, Senate author of the Highway Act of 1956, that it was unwise to require the Federal share of new roads to be paid for entirely by a few of the several highway use taxes. A good road system is a general service of government which benefits the whole economy. The need in underdeveloped countries for roads which will aid their business and commerce is often given to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee as a reason for sending them large amounts of money.

Better to close the many tax loopholes enjoyed by big business and big taxpayers to bring additional revenue into the Treasury than raise the gas tax. The Senate voted a few weeks ago to close the loophole for dividend income, and thereby bring $335 million into the Treasury, well over half the amount another cent of gas tax would bring in. But the administration strongly opposed that change, and it was lost in conference with the House of Representatives.

There are also excessive amounts in the President's budget for foreign aid which are being saved by Congress. We have already cut $400 million from his foreign aid budget, and I think more will be cut when we actually appropriate the money for it.

Because the economic argument for a higher gas tax is so thin, it is evident that it is really another effort to change from ability-to-pay taxes to sales taxes, and thus shift more of the tax load onto low- and middle-income groups. Watch for more sales taxes to be pushed in the future, if this effort to raise the gasoline tax succeeds.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, on still another date I discussed in a newsletter my views in opposition to an increase in the Federal gasoline sales tax. I ask unanimous consent that this material be inserted at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADMINISTRATION PUTS SQUEEZE ON CONGRESS

Another phase of political pressure technique in the closing days of a session of Congress is White House attempts to force through expedient measures. The present administration is very adept at these squeeze plays of political expediency. Such legislative proposals are offered as an expedient way of meeting some emergency situation rather than coming to grips with the problem by the passage of long-term legislation containing solutions fair to all.

A good example of political expediency is the drive now on by this administration to pass a law that amounts to a higher sales tax to be imposed upon the users of automobiles to pay for highway construction. This proposal by the White House to increase the Federal gasoline tax from 3 cents a gallon to 4½ cents is blatant expediency and it is grossly unfair.

If you would really like to see what pressure mail sent to a Senator contains, you should read some of my heavy mail urging me to vote for a 1½ cents per gallon increase in the Federal gasoline tax. The administration and the lobby at work for this Federal sales tax are "riding herd" on Congress these days, but I have no intention of being roped in. It is an unfair tax proposal, and all the rationalizations of its proponents can't make it a sound tax based upon the fundamental tax test of ability to pay.

In many States, including Oregon, the important highway construction program authorized in 1956 has come to a halt because the highway trust fund has run out of cash. Under the 1956 law, new highway user taxes, and an increase in the gasoline tax were levied to finance highway construction. Now, however, the fund is depleted, and construction has been suspended in many States. To remedy the situation, the President insists that the gasoline tax be raised another 1½ cents a gallon on top of the present 3 cents Federal tax.

Once again the public is not being given the facts. It is not being told that an increase in the Federal gasoline tax is both unnecessary and unfair. In urging this remedy, the President does not mention that 42 percent of all the various highway use taxes got into the general Treasury, and only 58 percent of the tax collection goes into the highway trust fund for road construction purposes.

If all these taxes went into the highway trust fund, there would be enough money in the fund to keep the road construction program going on schedule. The public is not being told that none of the 10 percent excise tax on new cars goes into the road construction trust fund, nor does any of the Federal tax on lubricating oil, automobile parts and automobile accessories. Only one-half of the excise tax on trucks, buses, and trailers goes into the fund.

As long as this is true, I do not feel that I can justify voting for another boost in the Federal gasoline tax on the basis of the lame excuse that it is needed for highway construction. I believe we should require all highway use taxes to go into the highway trust fund, or at least as much as is necessary to keep the road construction program on schedule. If more money than that is needed for roadbuilding purposes, then I believe Congress should appropriate money out of the Treasury itself to keep the authorized road construction program going.

WHY I OPPOSE RAISE IN GAS TAX

First, I think the present 3 cents per gallon Federal gasoline tax is high enough to cover the fair share that the gasoline user should be expected to pay toward highway costs. Don't forget that there are many other Federal excise taxes that the automobile owner must pay in addition to the gasoline tax. Also, don't forget that the user of an automobile is not the only one who benefits from the construction of a road.

Every economic interest that is served by a new road benefits, the owners of real estate along the road and every business to which the road helps to bring customers is benefited. In fact, the entire economic life of each community served by the road is enriched by its construction. Is it fair, therefore, to require the motorists to assume the cost of building the road just because it is easy and convenient to impose a gasoline sales tax and other forms of automobile sales taxes upon them, irrespective of their ability to pay?

All the economic interests of the community should be expected to chip in and help pay for this new capital asset which helps the economy of the entire area. It is my view that such capital investments as roads bring direct and indirect benefits to all the people and therefore, their major cost should be paid out of the general funds of the Treasury.

Second, excise taxes, such as a sales tax on gasoline and automobiles, are regressive taxes. They discourage purchases. They tend to restrict our economy; when we need an ever-expanding economy. I am very much opposed to an extension and enlargement of the excise tax policy. For several years, I have warned the people of our country to be on guard against attempts to use specific sales taxes as a back door approach to the imposition of a general Federal sales tax.

There are selfish economic groups in our country which, in reality, are best able to pay general taxes, but which are hard at when the cry is raised in the Halls of Congress to increase user taxes and sales taxes in order to relieve themselves of some of the taxes which, in all fairness, they should be expected to pay because of their ability to pay. I have no intention of helping promote their selfish aims by voting for an increase in a gasoline sales tax.

That leads me to point out that tax economists generally agree that excise and sales taxes bear no economic relationship to ability to pay taxes. They are usually adopted by politicians as the line of least resistance when the cry is raised in the Halls of Congress that some meritorious program like the road construction program is about to come to an end unless some funds are raised quickly. It is the line of least resistance because the highway contractors and construction unions are organized, but most motorists are not.

However, that is no justification for taking unfair tax advantage of automobile users simply because the politicians know that the use of the automobile has become an absolute necessity in modern American society. Rather, it is our duty as legislators to pass fair tax legislation to meet this highway trust fund emergency.

MORE HIGHWAY-USE TAXES SHOULD BE DEVOTED TO ROAD CONSTRUCTION

Why doesn't the present administration do it? Why doesn't the administration recognize the fairness of requiring that all the money which is now collected from the various automotive sales taxes should go into the highway trust fund for roadbuilding purposes?

Senator GORE of Tennessee, who is the author of the highway bill that brought the highway trust fund into being, has proposed amendments which would do just that. I am supporting those amendments. Senator GORE has proposed amendments to devote 100 percent of the Federal tax now collected on trucks and buses, 50 percent of the tax on lubricating oil, 50 percent of the tax on automobiles, and 100 percent of the tax on automobile parts and accessories to the highway trust fund for roadbuilding purposes. He points out that these revenues, in addition to the present 3 cents per gallon Federal tax on gasoline, amount to about $964 million. This would be enough to keep the roadbuilding program on schedule. In fact, an increase of 1½ cents in the Federal gasoline tax would raise only $800 million per year.

THE BALANCE-THE-BUDGET SCARECROW

The administration is opposing Senator GORE's proposal and insisting upon a 1½-cent-per-gallon increase in the Federal gasoline tax because it is a part of the President's balance-the-budget program. Even if we take them at their word, this is no way to balance the budget because it is not based upon the fair principle of ability to pay.

I, too, want to balance the administrative costs of Government with Government income, but I want our tax revenues to be derived from those who ought to pay them, rather than from those whom it is easy to victimize with various regressive excise and sales taxes.

My answer to the administration is that if it sincerely wants to avoid any deficit in connection with highway programs, let it agree to devote all of the highway user taxes to highways, and then make up any losses to the general funds of the Treasury by closing up the tax loopholes now available to big corporate enterprises and personal income taxpayers. The administration's proposal for an increase in gasoline taxes is another way of shifting more of the tax burden off the big fellow onto the consumers.

One of the reasons I fought so hard to eliminate hundreds of millions of dollars of waste in the foreign aid program was to make the necessary savings for many vitally needed domestic programs such as the highway construction program. Since we passed the foreign aid program in the Senate, the President's own special commission on foreign aid has issued a report in which it, too, points out that there is a great deal of waste in foreign aid.

Again, let me say I am for a sound foreign aid program based primarily upon loans for needed projects that will help the standard of living of the people in underdeveloped countries; but I am against the inexcusable waste of the American taxpayers' money that now honeycombs our foreign aid program. Let the budget balancers show their good faith by joining with us in stopping that waste.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, these materials which I have just inserted in the RECORD contain brief summaries of my reasons why I will never vote in the Senate, in view of the present economic situation of this country, for placing a greater burden on the people least able to pay by imposing a higher and higher gasoline tax upon them.

I take the position, Mr. President, in regard to the building of the highways, that it is the responsibility of all the people of the United States to pay for their construction. The burden should not just fall upon those who happen to drive on the highways, because the highways serve all economic interests. Highway construction ought to be paid for out of the Treasury of the United States. We ought to raise taxes based upon ability to pay, Mr. President, and pay for those highways. We ought not follow the line of least resistance, which I think we are following tonight, and that is, to impose an unfair tax upon those who have the least ability to pay.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, it was my purpose to speak on this subject. We need affirmative action now to continue the highway program.

I realize the compulsion under which we toil, and I ask unanimous consent that the remarks I had intended to make be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION NECESSARY TO CONTINUE HIGHWAY PROGRAM

One month ago I spoke in this Chamber and called attention to what I then termed the immediate effects of three stalemates upon the domestic economy of this country. Reference was made to the breakdown of negotiations between management and labor which brought on the protracted steel strike. Then I mentioned the variance of views of the President and the Congress on housing and highway legislation. Neither of the first two of these impasses, the steel strike and housing legislation problems, is any closer to being set aside by solution. In fact, in each instance the country is further away than it was 1 month ago from being the beneficiary of the good that would accrue to the economy and the social order if we were to have a settlement of the steel strike and adequate new housing legislation on the statute books.

It was demonstrated that men of understanding can work toward the desired end of sensible compromise when the committee on conference produced a report that brought many opposites into consonance through the application of give-and-take. The same should have been true with respect to labor-management collective bargaining in the steel industry and certainly there is no reason for an even worse stalemate to have been brought about with respect to housing legislation by another Presidential veto.

In speaking of the situation as it pertained to the housing problem, I stated that the Senate already had achieved sensible compromise when it accepted the conference committee report on the first housing bill passed by the 86th Congress. I remarked then and reiterate with emphasis now, we can cooperate, when possible, with the executive branch, but we must not abdicate.

Yes, we still have the steel strike as a stalemate blight upon our country's economic progress, and we have another White House sponsored impasse on public housing legislative authority.

But we may be only a step away from bringing to an end the third distressing stalemate to which I referred, on which occasion I deplored the lack of positive action and apparent unwillingness or inability to compromise positions necessary to solve the perplexing problem of highway finance policy and programing.

It was then that I said, too, that we are approaching an economic disaster period, at least in degree, when we trifle with progress in the building and construction industry of the United States—an authority which is dedicating itself to necessary housing and highway programs.

I have opposed an increase of the Federal tax on gasoline as long as taxes paid by highway users to the Federal Government are not dedicated wholly or in substantial part to help pay the national share of the Federal-States highway construction and maintenance programs.

It would be my preference that the gasoline tax be reserved to the States en toto if all other factors in the equation were equal.

At this time, however, a compromise seems to be forced upon us by the exigencies of Executive Department policies and demands on the one side and the pressure of time requirements on the other.

Our first consideration must be that of sustaining the country's highway program which, in turn, ties in so closely with extremely important elements of our economic pattern.

It seems important, in this connection, that we bring into focus the impact of the highway program upon the total economy, and to understand why we must take vital action now, even if it is on the basis of a compromise arrangement for which a substantial number of us as individuals have less enthusiasm than we might have for a measure which would not call for increasing the Federal tax on gasoline.

Since 1957, the highway construction dollar has been expended on an average as follows: 27 percent for labor; 44 percent for materials; 29 percent for equipment and overhead.

For each $1 billion of highway investment expenditure, 228 million man hours of work have been provided. In terms of payroll, this represents approximately $500 million per $1 billion of total highway spending.

This same $1 billion of highway expenditure for construction also contributes to gross national product, in part, as follows: 510,000 tons of steel; 995,000 tons of bituminous materials; 16 million barrels of cement; 18½ million pounds of explosives; 76½ million tons of aggregate; 122 million gallons of petroleum products.

In addition to these statistics, it is important to bear these figures in mind, too.

For each $1 billion in excess of the annual rate of $5.8 billion of highway construction, 345,584 pieces of construction equipment and 22,500 vehicles—cars and trucks—have been contributed to the gross national product.

Indeed, much of the stability of the country's economy hinges upon the progress of the construction industry, the heavy construction equipment industry, and the supporting supply industries.

By the same token, as the new chairman of my home State's newly formed economic development agency, Lawrence Rogers, is pointing out in a statement this weekend, "Without a comprehensive road program, the State's economic development agency will be virtually powerless to achieve its aims," because "a State master plan is meaningless without the road system to make it work."

Doubtless, the same situation obtains with respect to most States and, as we are fully aware, each State has come to the point of planning its highway network largely around the Federal Interstate or the Federal ABC authorizations and actual allocations made to it by the U.S. Bureau of Public Roads.

In the light of these facts, we have a duty to provide positive action—and without delay—to come to grips with a compromise solution which will provide immediate relief for the pressing problems in West Virginia and the Nation without creating a disastrous delaying action or a stretch-out which would retard highway progress, severely lessen needed employment and force the impairment or liquidation of many construction companies and allied businesses and industries.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, to some of my constituents back home I have repeatedly made statements to the effect that as between financing the highway trust fund by taking moneys out of the general fund, which is now in stringent straits, on the one hand, and decelerating the program, on the other, they would choose the latter. The bill before the Senate provides that there shall be taken out of the general fund, in 1962, $800 million. The general fund cannot stand that. I will not vote for the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). The bill having been read the third time, the question is, shall it pass? The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. If he were present and voting, he would vote "yea"; if I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay." I therefore withhold my vote.

The rollcall was concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. McGEE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] are absent on official business.

I further announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH] is absent on official business attending the Interparliamentary Conference in Warsaw, Poland.

On this vote, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN] is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. McGEE]. If present and voting, the Senator from North Carolina would vote "nay" and the Senator from Wyoming would vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS]. If present and voting, the Senator from Indiana would vote "nay" and the Senator from Florida would vote "yea."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] would each vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] is absent on official business attending the Interparliamentary Union Conference at Warsaw, Poland.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] are detained on official business.

If present and voting the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA] would each vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is paired with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER]. If present and voting, the Senator from New Hampsire would vote "yea" and the Senator from Arizona would vote "nay."

The pair of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has been previously announced.

The result was announced—yeas 70, nays 11, as follows:

So the bill (H.R. 8678) was passed.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, request a conference with the House of Representatives thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair) appointed Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. KERR, Mr. MCNAMARA, Mr. COOPER, and Mr. MARTIN conferees on the part of the Senate.

CALL OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday after the morning business, there be a call of the calendar for the consideration of measures to which there is no objection, beginning with Calendar No. 812.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. I object.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? At what time is it expected the Senate will meet on Monday?

Mr. ANDERSON. Objection has been made to the call of the calendar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We will have to see what time the Senate takes a recess. Objection was made to the call of the calendar on Monday.

EXTENSION OF AGRICULTURAL TRADE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1954

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 518, S. 1748.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon will state it.

Mr. MORSE. Will the majority leader tell us what the bill is?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is the bill to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes; the bill which was previously under consideration and which was displaced in order to take up the bill just passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1748) to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time limitation in connection with Senate bill 1748, to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes, not begin to run until the bill is laid before the Senate on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. MORSE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I submit reports from the Committee on Public Works.

PRINTING OF REVIEW OF REPORTS ON CENTRAL AND SOUTHERN FLORIDA PROJECTS, KISSIMEE RIVER BASIN (S. DOC. NO. 53)

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I present a letter from the Secretary of the Army, transmitting an interim report dated April 8, 1959, from the Chief of Engineers, Department of the Army, together with accompanying papers and illustrations, on a review of reports on central and southern Florida projects, Kissimee River Basin—Nicodemus Slough area—requested by the Committee on Public Works, U.S. Senate, adopted November 15, 1954. I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed as a Senate document, with illustrations, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon will state it.

Mr. MORSE. In regard to the first matters the Senator from New Mexico sent to the desk, do I correctly understand that the Senator from New Mexico has filed reports from the Committee on Public Works?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Yes, from the Committee on Public Works.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct; and the Senator from New Mexico has asked to have a document printed.

Mr. MORSE. I thought he requested that the second one be printed as a document.

Mr. CHAVEZ. One is a letter from the Army Engineers, making a report on a project in Florida. The other were incidental bills reported by the Committee on Public Works, for the calendar.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MORSE. Do I correctly understand——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: In whose time are we now proceeding? I asked that the time required for the making of insertions in the RECORD, and so forth, not be charged to the time available to either side under the limitation; but objection was made; and we are now under controlled time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Some Senator who has time under his control will have to yield time before any Senator can make a statement at this time.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon will state it.

Mr. MORSE. Is there not before the Senate a unanimous-consent request by the Senator from New Mexico?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state his inquiry again?

Mr. MORSE. Is there not before the Senate a unanimous-consent request by the Senator from New Mexico?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asked whether there was objection to the request for the printing as a document of the material then submitted.

Mr. MORSE. And I proceeded at once to propound a parliamentary inquiry, preparatory to deciding whether I would object.

I respectfully point out to the Chair that I am in a position to reserve the right to object, and I do reserve the right to object; and if I cannot have time in which to inquire about this matter, I will object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a moment ago, I asked unanimous consent that all Senators might be allowed time in which to make insertions in the RECORD and to present other matters, and that the controlled time not begin to run until Monday, so that Senators could now make insertions in the RECORD and unanimous-consent requests, and so forth.

I renew that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. I object.

I object also to the filing of the papers, and so forth, to be printed as a document.

PRINTING OF CERTAIN NUMBER OF COPIES OF INVESTIGATION INTO FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and the chairman of the Finance Committee, I submit a resolution for which I request immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read, for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 187) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on Finance two thousand five hundred copies of an analysis (part 7) of the hearings entitled "Investigation of the Financial Condition of the United States," held by that committee during the 85th Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say that I have no objection to the resolution, as I explained to the Senator from New Mexico, to whom I talked about this matter some time ago.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, adoption of the resolution is necessary, because the present stock of the hearings has been exhausted. Five thousand five hundred copies were printed; but the requests made by Senators have exceeded that supply.

Therefore, I should like to have the resolution agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 187) was considered and agreed to.

REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE—PRINTING OF REVIEW OF REPORTS ON CENTRAL AND SOUTHERN FLORIDA PROJECTS, KISSIMEE RIVER BASIN (S. DOC. NO. 53)

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], if he wishes to make a statement.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I would plead with my good friend, the Senator from Oregon, in connection with the request I have already made. I have reported three bills from the Committee on Public Works. I am not trying to use the time available to any other Member of the Senate or to take advantage of any Senator.

After the committee has taken action on the bills and after they are ordered reported to the Senate, I think it only fair that I be permitted to report them to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to receiving the reports submitted by the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon will state it.

Mr. MORSE. In reporting the bills from the Committee on Public Works, is the Senator from New Mexico placing those measures in a position in which they may be considered by the Senate, under the rule, after they have been before the Senate for the definite period of time called for by the rule, which, according to my recollection, is 3 days?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that the measures reported are not general appropriation bills; thus, the measures reported can be considered after 1 legislative day has intervened.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Chair.

I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico?

The Chair hears none.

Without objection, the reports will be received, and the bills will be placed on the calendar.

The reports are as follows:

By Mr. CHAVEZ, from the Committee on Public Works, without amendment:

S. 2362. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Army to convey to the city of Arlington, Oreg., certain lands at the John Day lock and dam project (Rept. No. 912); and

H.R. 7125. An act to provide for a study of the feasibility of establishing the President Adams Parkway (Rept. No. 910).

By Mr. CHAVEZ, from the Committee on Public Works, with an amendment:

S. 793. A bill to amend title 23 of the United States Code in order to increase the amount authorized for bridges over Federal dams (Rept. No. 911).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico for the printing of a Senate document?

The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

PROGRAM ON MONDAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, does any other Senator desire me to yield to him at this time?

If no Senator now desires that I yield——

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the majority leader give us some guidance and direction relating to the procedure on Monday morning, in connection with Senate bill 1748?

On Monday commence, after the prayer, will there be a morning hour; or will the Senate proceed forthwith after a quorum call, to resume the consideration of Senate bill 1748 and the amendments thereto?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am afraid I cannot give the Senator that information.

I should like to have the Senate have a morning hour on Monday, and I should like to have Senators be able to transact the public business. But that must be done under a unanimous-consent request; and I do not know whether the request will be objected to or not.

I plan to make the request, as I have done numerous times today, and for the last several days.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that on Monday, there may be the usual morning hour for the transaction of routine business, including the submission of petitions and memorials; and that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I suggest that, in view of the lateness of the present hour, we agree that the request be renewed on Monday morning.

As of now, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I say to the Senator from Minnesota that is the answer to his question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield further?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I understood the Senator from Oregon to say that in view of the lateness of the present hour, he would prefer to have that request renewed on Monday morning.

I have a feeling that the Senator from Oregon will be cooperative.

Let me add that if there is objection, then I understand that the Senate will proceed at that time to resume the consideration of Senate bill 1743, and to consider the amendments to that bill, as laid before the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The bill is now before the Senate; is it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. And if the Members of the Senate wish to submit certain routine business, a Senator who then had the floor could yield for that purpose—unless, of course, there were objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. But if a Senator objected, the Senator who then had the floor could yield only for a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes.

Let me state that I have a feeling that we shall be a much happier body about 24 hours from now; in fact, I hope it will not take even that long.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would hope so.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I think we will.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

RESOLUTION OF COUNCIL OF CHIEFS, ST. REGIS TRIBE OF INDIANS OF NEW YORK

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Council of Chiefs of the St. Regis Tribe of Indians in New York State, relating to the leasing of lands owned by that tribe.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Whereas the American St. Regis Indian Reservation in New York State is located adjacent to the St. Lawrence River; and

"Whereas the said Indian reservation lands are the only lands still available in the United States and east of the first locks in the St. Lawrence Seaway for industrial and commercial purposes; and

"Whereas the St. Lawrence Seaway has made the availability of such lands of tremendous importance toward industrial and commercial progress in the United States; and

"Whereas, we, the Council of Chiefs of the St. Regis Indian Tribe of American Indians, recognize that possible leases of some of the lands of our reservation in this area would inure to the benefit of the tribal membership: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we, the Council of Chiefs of the St. Regis Tribe of Indians in New York State, residing upon our reservation at Hogansburg, N.Y., recommend that legislation be adopted by Congress declaring that lands owned by the St. Regis Tribe of Indians may be leased for such purposes and for such periods as may be permitted by the laws of the State of New York."

The clerk of our tribe is hereby directed to forward a copy of this resolution to those representatives in our U.S. Government and other officials for the purpose that such legislation may be adopted at the present session of Congress or any future session.

Dated the 31st day of August 1959.

MARGARET C. LAZORE,
Clerk.

INTEREST RATE ON SERIES E AND H U.S. SAVINGS BONDS—SUPPLEMENTAL VIEWS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I send to the desk the supplemental views of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], on the bill (H.R.

9035) to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that the supplemental views may be printed as a part of Senate Report No. 909.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MORSE. The majority leader is sending to the desk the supplemental views of members of a committee which has made and filed a report. Is that the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. MORSE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS TO MONDAY AT 9 A.M.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate now stand in recess until Monday, at 9 o'clock a.m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes a.m., on Sunday, September 6, 1959) the Senate took a recess until Monday, September 7, 1959, at 9 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Mark 5: 36: Be not afraid, only believe.

Almighty God, as we daily encounter unknown and untried experiences, may we commit ourselves to Thy divine providence with courage and hope, claiming Thy promise, "I will never fail thee nor forsake thee."

We cannot ask for anything more and dare not ask for anything less than the assurance of Thy presence, Thy peace, and Thy power in our longings and labors to discharge faithfully and for Thy glory the tasks and responsibilities which are ours.

Help us to subdue and conquer every self-centered ambition and desire and may our minds and hearts be stirred with new vistas of blessedness and new visions of service for all the needy members of the human family.

Hear us in the name of the Master who went about doing good. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 2457. An act to provide equitable treatment for producers participating in the soil bank program on the basis of incorrect information furnished by the Government.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2181) entitled "An act to amend the Mineral Leasing Act of February 25, 1920," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. Moss, and Mr. ALLOTT to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 8575) entitled "An act making appropriations for military construction for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate concurs in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2 to the above-entitled bill.

The message also announced that the Senate recedes from its amendment No. 1 to the bill (H.R. 7040) entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, corporations, agencies, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate, having proceeded to reconsider the bill (S. 2539) entitled "An act to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes," returned by the President of the United States, with his objections, to the Senate, in which it originated, it was

Resolved, That the said bill do not pass, two-thirds of the Senate present not having voted in the affirmative.

LEGISLATIVE BUSINESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order for the Speaker on Thursday of next week, as well as the remainder of next week, to recognize to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall have to object until we know what bills are to come before the House.

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, the gentleman, of course, is aware of the fact, or ought to know—and I am sure he does—that the majority leader, who happens to be me, would keep the House advised as early as possible of suspensions coming up, except some emergency matter that might arise which would require immediate action.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I would not be opposed to this request on an emergency matter, but I must object to giving that kind of blanket authority to bring bills up without knowing what the bills are. Therefore, I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McCORMACK. I announce that next Monday one of the suspensions will be a resolution to enable the Speaker to recognize to suspend the rules. I hope my friend will not press his objection, however.

Mr. GROSS. I have objected.

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, the gentleman can always withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. McCORMACK. I announce that one of the suspensions on Monday will be a resolution to that effect.

I also desire to announce that another suspension on Monday will be H.R. 9069, a bill to provide standards for the issuance of passports, and for other purposes.

I also desire to announce that from the Committee on House Administration—while it is not necessary to request unanimous consent, because they have a preferential status—there are 10 resolutions from the Subcommittee on Printing of the Committee on House Administration, which I will insert in the RECORD at this point:

House Resolution 341, House Resolution 352, House Resolution 353, House Resolution 354, House Resolution 370, House Concurrent Resolution 404, House Concurrent Resolution 405, Senate Concurrent Resolution 53, Senate Concurrent Resolution 72, House Resolution 378.

These all have to do with the printing of documents.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I notice my leader, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS] is here today. He called me earlier in the day about Government business. Now, is there any use of us staying around today, making a point of no quorum, and inconveniencing Members?

Mr. McCORMACK. I can assure the gentleman, as I said yesterday, that there is no legislative business today. The only possible matter that action might be taken up, if the Senate passes the extension of Public Law 480, would be to send it to conference.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is the bill the Senate was considering last night?

Mr. McCORMACK. That is my understanding, and that is the only business of a legislative nature that we would take up and send that bill to conference if it is messaged over here.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Would the situation be the same on Monday?

Mr. McCORMACK. The situation will be different on Monday. The Consent Calendar will be called on Monday. That can be taken care of by unanimous consent. Then there are several suspensions and there is a unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into that if there are any rollcalls on Monday, they will go over until Tuesday.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Does that apply to quorum calls, too?

Mr. McCORMACK. No; it does not apply to quorum calls.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMACK. I could not bind myself to that extent.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the majority leader if the Senate today passes the extension of Public Law 480, whether it will be in order to appoint conferees at any time during the day while the House is in session?

Mr. McCORMACK. That is the intention.

Mr. HOEVEN. I notice there are several special orders scheduled. At any time during the period of those special orders, it will be in order to appoint conferees?

Mr. McCORMACK. That is the intention. Of course, I do not know what may develop. If it looks as though the Senate may pass the bill after the special orders have been concluded—and I am not saying that is going to happen, but it could happen—it would be agreeable to me for the House to take a recess for the purpose of meeting again to receive the message from the Senate. That has not even been discussed and I do not know what may happen in this regard. I just wanted to go one step further in connection with possible action today than the gentleman's inquiry went.

Mr. HOEVEN. The reason I make the inquiry is that, as ranking minority member of the conferees, I am rather anxious to get that bill to conference so that we may expedite the business of the House.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am aware of that, and we are also anxious.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to advise the Members of the House that in addition to the other bills to come up under suspension on Monday, there is a bill, H.R. 8429, to amend the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950.

Mr. GROSS. Can the gentleman state whether these bills will come up substantially in the order in which they are listed under suspension of the rules?

Mr. McCORMACK. I will promise the gentleman they will with the exception that the first one might be if it is, and I hope it will be adjusted or arranged between now and Monday, the first one I indicated with reference to the resolution on suspensions starting on Thursday of next week, that might be the first one. I will not hold myself to it. But if the gentleman from Iowa wants me to, I will make the promise that they will be brought up in the order in which they were announced. Does the gentleman want that?

Mr. GROSS. I think it would be helpful to the Members of the House to know the order they will be brought up.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am not questioning the gentleman, but if he tells me that he wants it that way, I will exercise my limited influence to persuade the Speaker to do it that way.

Mr. GROSS. I think it would be helpful to all the Members of the House to know in what order the bills are coming up. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is that what the gentleman wants? The gentleman can answer "Yes" or "No."

Mr. GROSS. Yes. This is for the benefit of the Members of the House also so that they may know; this is not just to please the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. McCORMACK. I understand thoroughly, but all I want is to have the gentleman tell me that is what he wants, and I will promise to use my influence to see that they will be brought up in the order they have been announced.

LABOR CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. KOWALSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. KOWALSKI. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, after long discussions and heated debates on the labor bill, I was called upon to declare myself for or against the labor conference report. This was not an easy decision for me to make. Deep inside of me fundamentals were in conflict.

Eleven years ago and 9,000 miles from here on the other side of the globe, I was privileged to participate in the greatest peacetime revolution the world has ever seen. At that time I was a member of that historic American military team which brought democracy to a devastated and beaten Japan.

There, under the inspired leadership of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, we reorganized the governmental structure of a war-torn nation, introducing popular elections for the national government, the governors, state assemblies, and local officials. We changed their legal structure and recodified their laws. We encouraged the nation to decentralize its school system and introduced local school boards. We instituted a program of progressive land reform, giving to those who worked the land the right to own it. But most important of all, we brought to the workingman a new hope of dignity and opportunity, the right to group together, to organize into unions. For man is not born to stand alone.

It was my task as military governor in the Osaka-Kyoto-Kobe industrial complex to explain to the Japanese workers the meaning, the potential, and the obligations of unions in a democracy. We helped to establish labor relations boards and explained to the board members, the workers, the managers, and the public the purpose of these agencies. We sustained the right of the Japanese workers to organize, to strike, to picket, to use the accepted, peaceful tools of the trade unionist in his efforts to negotiate for better working conditions and economic security. Under the brilliant guidance of General MacArthur, union membership rose from a few thousand to six and a half million workers. This was dynamic America bringing to a defeated people not only the fruits of democracy but the elements of democratic action. In this way we reached the hearts of the Japanese people. And may I say, that dedicated to this democratic approach we can reach the minds and hearts of all the people in the world.

So yesterday as I sat on the floor of the House waiting for my name to be called I could not get out of my mind that if I voted for the labor conference report I would thereby be repudiating what I did and what this great Nation did in taking democracy abroad. If the accepted tools of trade unions were right and were needed to establish democracy in Japan then how could I vote against these tools here in my country. If in executing the mission assigned to me by my Government in Japan, I was correct in sustaining the right of the Japanese workers to organize, to strike, to picket, the right to use accepted democratic trade union tools, then how could I take these rights away from the American workingman.

FISCAL IRRESPONSIBILITY

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Speaker, as a result of fiscal irresponsibility, the public debt has increased from nearly $43 billion in 1940 to approximately $290 billion today—or $247 billion in just 20 short years. Yet, the Congress has failed to do anything about this unreasonable and unsound increase. We have been all too willing to grant authority to lift the legal debt ceiling, but we have failed miserably in facing up to our responsibility in the matter of paying off this debt. My bill, H.R. 5203, would correct this error and provide a reasonable method for paying off this tremendous debt we have accumulated.

Any family or prudent business may be faced with the necessity of borrowing money at times, but the prudent family or businessman will set aside a certain amount of money, out of receipts, to meet such obligations. If not, that family or businessman will soon face bankruptcy. Is it not reasonable to say the same principle applies to the Federal Government? As a matter of fact, I am of the opinion the Government should be even more alert in employing sound methods in meeting its obligations since the solvency of the Federal Government is a matter affecting the lives of each American citizen. H.R. 5203 is based on this idea. It is a sound method and I earnestly believe it deserves the support of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5203 would require the President to include in each budget he submits to Congress an amount, not less than 5 percent of the estimated budget receipts for the ensuing fiscal year, for retirement of the public debt. After July 1 of each year, the Treasury would be required to set aside the first amounts received until the 5-percent figure was obtained. That amount would then be applied on the debt. In addition, the bill would prevent the President from recommending loans as a means of making up any estimated deficiency in the budget except in time of war. This provision would require the President to recommend taxes or other appropriate action as a means of balancing the budget. For example, if the receipts for the fiscal year 1961 were estimated to be $80 billion, the President would include $4 billion, as a budget item, to be used solely for retirement of the public debt. If the remainder of the estimated expenditures was in excess of $76 billion, the President would be required to recommend additional taxes or other action, but he could not recommend loans, as a means of making up the estimated deficiency. Then, after the budget went into effect, July 1, 1961, the first $4 billion received in the Treasury would be applied on the debt.

It certainly seems to me to be just good common sense to adopt such a method of meeting our obligations. We do include in the budget the amount necessary to pay the interest on the public debt. Is it then not reasonable to also carry an item for payment on the debt?

Under my proposal, we would enter the turn of the next century debt-free, if we consider revenues will increase at the rate of 3 percent annually. I admit it is difficult to forecast any future expectations with respect to revenues in each of the next 40 years. However, a 3-percent increase per year is believed to be a reasonably conservative estimate. For example, the budget receipts in 1940 were $5.144 billion and the receipts in 1958 amounted to $69.117 billion.

In fiscal year 1960, it is estimated that the interest on the debt will amount to $8 billion. Beginning in 1940, and in every year thereafter, the annual interest charge on the public debt reached a cost in excess of $1 billion. For the period from 1940 through 1960, we will have expended about $105 billion on interest expenditures. If the estimated level of debt of $285 billion for 1960 is maintained without reduction, at an annual interest rate of 3 percent, the total interest cost for the 40-year period 1961–2000 will be $342 billion. We surely cannot expect the American people and their children to bear such a financial burden. If we do not take active steps to reduce the debt now, these estimated large sums may be even larger, for at the rate we have been going, the legal debt limit is nothing more than legal fiction, and the debt will continue to rise.

It seems to me that if we do not take steps to retire the public debt now, such steps may not be taken at all. At the present time, our gross national product, our national income, and the personal income is at an alltime high. It just does not make sense in the face of such facts that our national debt should also be at an alltime high. Now is the time for us to pay off, or at least adopt a reasonable plan for retiring this tremendous burden.

In addition to this recommended action, I respectfully submit that we must strive to eliminate, by gradual reduction, three substantial expenditure items now carried in the budget. Once we have eliminated or greatly reduced them we should not be plagued by deficits and necessary borrowing, except in dire emergencies. One of these items, as I have suggested, is the interest on the debt, which accounts for about 10 percent of the budget expenditures. Another item is Federal aid to the States, and to local units, individuals and others within the State. The third item that should be drastically reduced is the foreign-aid program.

The expenditures in Federal aid to the States, local units, individuals and others within the State, in fiscal year 1958 amounted to $7.4 billion. This also represented about 10 percent of the budget. Fiscal responsibility for providing these services should be returned to the States.

Mr. Speaker, there was a time when we agreed with our 22d President, Grover Cleveland, when he stated, "though the people support the Government, the Government should not support the people." Apparently, we have discarded that notion and have reverted to a theory leading toward a paternalistic form of government. It seems we no longer have the fear which haunted the founders of this Nation—the fear of a strong Central Government in which the functions of local and State government are limited and the freedom of the individual is likewise restricted. No longer does the majority cherish the sense of responsibility for the support of Government. Instead, when maladjustment develops, the Federal Government is called upon to act, possibly to create another bureau or commission. Thus, we have become masters in bureaucracy.

An excellent example of the faulty approach we have too often taken is indicated in a recent statement made by Adm. John T. Hayward, Assistant Chief of Naval Operations for Research and Development, when he concluded:

> After a year of furious U.S. activity, I sincerely conclude that U.S. supremacy in space science is threatened, not by lack of talent, but by our skill in bureaucracy.

I want to add that it is this skill in bureaucracy and the concept of government we have adopted that has brought on the enormous debt and the excessive and nonessential Federal spending.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that one of the best ways to achieve fiscal responsibility reduce and balance the Federal budget and bring about an orderly retirement of the national debt, is for the State and local governments as well as the individual citizens to assume their proper responsibilities without relying upon the Federal Government for support.

I suggest in accomplishing that, the Federal Government could withdraw from certain tax sources which the States can successfully tap to provide adequate funds for financing these necessary programs.

With respect to the third item that I maintain we should eliminate or drastically reduce, I believe the ill effects of the foreign-aid program will soon cause us to stop and take stock of this foolish expenditure. However, it is not my purpose to belabor that issue at this time. But I do submit that the American people should wake up to the dire results and ill effects this foreign-aid giveaway is having upon our own domestic affairs and our international relations. It is serious.

In summary then, Mr. Speaker, I want to strongly recommend that we begin to seriously consider the future of this great country of ours.

We must remain strong, vigilant and thrifty. It is time that we settled down to do some serious reflection upon our own state of affairs and start to get our own house in order. We must adopt a policy of fiscal responsibility. I urge the Congress to live up to its responsibility in this area. I believe my plan has merit and I hope the fine Committee on Government Operations will consider H.R. 5203 in the near future.

DR. WILLIAM CAMPBELL BROWNE, PROMINENT PHYSICIAN OF CURWENSVILLE, CLEARFIELD COUNTY, PA., IS NEARING THE COMPLETION OF 60 YEARS SPENT IN THE PRACTICE OF MEDICINE

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, at the turn of the century the community of Burnside, Clearfield County, Pa., beckoned to the youthful Philadelphia physician Dr. William C. Browne a year after his graduation in 1899 from Hahnemann Medical College. This year marks the 60th year of Dr. Browne's practice of medicine in Clearfield County, 34 years of which were spent in Burnside, and the remaining 26 years in Curwensville where he is still active at the age of 82 in the daily practice of his noble profession.

Dr. Browne's medical career is unique since it embraces both the horse and buggy era of the family doctor in rural America and the present highly specialized age of medical advancement. True to the high precepts of the medical profession Dr. Browne has kept pace with scientific progress in the field of medicine and surgery.

As a result he can indulge in fond recollections of the so-called "horse and buggy" days and enjoy comparing them with the modern methods of healing which he has acquired from constant study and daily practice of his profession. Thus in the discharge of his role of a country doctor who has acquired knowledge of all the modern techniques in the fields of surgery and internal medicine he speaks with authority born of 60 years of surging forward in medicine's and humanity's struggle against disease and death.

Dorothy Bladin Hill in a touching tribute to the family doctor had in mind such a physician as Dr. William C. Browne when she penned the following lines:

FAMILY DOCTOR

Out of a world of black ignorance and jagged fear
Standing sturdy like a beacon of guiding light
Dispelling the horror of a pain-filled night,
You come to us, with your brusque, good cheer.

How quick your hands to probe, your eyes to peer;
What God-given strength lies in your quiet might,
What sinewy muscles you use to win your fight.
It's over, and instantly your face is clear

As you smile over a task well done.
Quietly you repack your medical kit
And stop a moment long enough to say,
"How bright the room is with the morning sun!"
And then you go again, doing your needed bit
To help the world face yet another day.

During World War I Dr. Browne served in France as a captain in the Army Medical Corps. After his discharge from the Army Medical Corps he became a member of the Medical Corps Reserve and later retired with the rank of full colonel.

Dr. Browne during 55 of the 60 years of medical practice has had a valiant ally in his devoted wife Fannie. Together they celebrated their 55th wedding anniversary and Mrs. Browne's 82d birthday on August 4 at a dinner given them by their family at the Clearfield-Curwensville Country Club.

There are many families in the Burnside and Curwensville areas who can look back over the years and recall that they and their children and grandchildren have regarded Dr. Browne as "our family doctor." A great number of them were delivered at birth by Dr. Browne and today many of them as individuals take pride in saying, "I'm one of his babies."

The older residents recall Dr. Browne in his role as a general practitioner who drove his horse and buggy over the hills of Clearfield County with a little black bag that served as his drugstore. In those days there were few if any prescriptions to write because "Doc" Browne as he is affectionately called carried his remedies with him. His grateful patients found however, that he carried more than pills and cough syrup. He also dispensed confidence, advice, and cheer coupled with good common sense, all of which proved powerful stimulants to troubled hearts.

Today "Doc" Browne still retains the same philosophy of life as he now prescribes the modern miracle drugs that are a monument to the progress of medicine.

It would be difficult to even try to enumerate the many kind deeds of amiable "Doc" Browne and the great good he accomplished for suffering humanity who sought and obtained his medical care. Suffice to say that many grateful hearts continue to sing his praises for his dedicated zeal in alleviating human ills. Those who were unable to pay for medical care were never denied "Doc" Browne's healing touch. The result is that such unpaid medical fees over a period of 60 years represents a sizable investment in humanity by the genial "Doc" Browne.

Truly he is a member of the large group of pioneering physicians who have added luster to their names and their profession and thus have merited lasting appreciation.

Ida Marian Breed emphasized the role the medical profession plays in the crowded ways of life when she wrote the following tribute which in a sense can be made applicable to physicians both living and dead:

MEMORIAL TO A DOCTOR

A straight young man goes swiftly by,
Once twisted child with halting crutch;
My heart sees a memorial
To my dead father's healing touch.

It has been my good fortune to value Dr. William C. Browne as a close personal friend for many years. Therefore, it is a pleasure to join in a dual salute to one of Clearfield County's best-loved physicians on the 60th year of the practice of his profession, and to extend to him and his devoted wife heartiest congratulations on their 55th wedding anniversary.

In concluding this tribute of love and respect to Dr. and Mrs. William C. Browne, I wish to include at this point in my remarks the following interesting article written by Mary Ellen McEwan, staff writer of the Clearfield (Pa.) Progress, which appeared in the July 11, 1959, issue following a personal interview with Dr. Browne at his office in Curwensville, Pa.:

DR. BROWNE IN 60TH YEAR OF PRACTICE

(By Mary Ellen McEwan)

A short, neat, elderly man walked into the waiting room. "I'll be with you in a minute," he smiled, as he returned to his office and one of the thousands of patients he has treated in the last six decades.

Dr. William C. Browne, of Curwensville, this year marks his 60th anniversary as a physician, having devoted his life to the service of mankind through the medical profession.

Still spry at 82, Dr. Browne was born March 30, 1877, in Philadelphia. He attended Girard College and graduated from Hahnemann Medical College in 1899.

A year after graduation, he took up residence in Clearfield County and began his practice in Burnside. Thirty-four years later he moved to Curwensville, where he has lived ever since.

In regard to his early years of practice, Dr. Browne recalled that at one time there was very little respect for members of the medical profession.

"People felt that doctors should be on call 24 hours a day, 365 days a year," he began. "Fees were meager. Why, even today's doctors' calls are just a little more than taxi fares.

"Transportation developments have helped the medical profession greatly in the last 60 years," he continued. "In 1900, Clearfield County had perhaps 1 doctor for every 1,200 to 1,500 people. Today, we have only about one-third or one-half that many physicians, but automobiles and good roads make it possible for a doctor to do 5 or 10 times the amount of work as he did in 'horse and buggy days.'"

Dr. Browne recalled that he often traveled in a buggy, and when the roads were too muddy for that, he would ride on horseback. "There were many times when the only way I could get to a patient was by pulling on my hip boots and wading through the mud," he added.

When asked if all of these experiences had ever affected his own health, he recalled that on many occasions he was sicker than the patients he visited, but that in 60 years' practice he has only missed 6 days' work.

Problems confronting medical science have changed during Dr. Browne's career.

"In 1902 I treated 190 cases of smallpox," he related. "Nowadays, this and other diseases such as diphtheria, scarlet fever, and typhoid, all great threats at one time, are not heard of very often."

Asked what he thought was the greatest discovery in medicine during his lifetime, Dr. Browne replied that antibiotics were probably the greatest advance, but that their use had been greatly abused at times by physicians who did not realize the potential dangers of the drugs.

Other great contributions to medicine cited by the doctor included the X-ray machine and the use of radium.

"From 1900 until today, the X-ray has developed into a wonderful tool of medicine," he explained. "Also, the use of radium has been introduced in the pathological laboratory, greatly advancing the diagnosis and cure of many diseases."

Looking toward the future, Dr. Browne said that he thinks the greatest need in scientific advancement is a definite means of making a diagnosis of cancer in its earlier stages when the disease is curable.

Sharing Dr. Browne's life with him for the past 54 years, Mrs. Browne is the former Fannie Browell. The Brownes, who will celebrate their 55th anniversary August 4, have three children and six grandchildren.

During World War I he served as a medical officer in France, where he studied for a short time at the University of Bordeaux after his discharge. Returning home, he remained active in the Reserves and retired as a full colonel in 1941.

Dr. Browne gave up confinement work 3 years ago, but he still keeps a full schedule of office, home, and hospital calls. Does he ever plan to retire? "Not as long as I'm able to work," he answered, hurrying to type a prescription.

THE REPORT OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I have now had the dubious pleasure of reading the diatribe written by certain dubious members of the Civil Rights Commission which I understand will be filed with the Congress next week. It is apparent that some members of the Civil Rights Commission have decided that their perpetuation in office must be effected no matter what the cost.

There is some encouragement in the knowledge that the report is far from unanimous, and that those who favor drastic civil rights action vary in their extremes.

But I shall approach this report somewhat differently, perhaps, than others, by saying that I am glad the report contains what it does.

Now the American people will have a much better idea of just what we in the South, as well as millions of intelligent, reasonable people in the North and West, have prophesied concerning this idiotic experiment of creating the Civil Rights Commission.

This is not a question of voting rights; this is not a question of equality; this is not a question of educational opportunities; this is a question of whether America, as we know it, will continue to survive as a free Nation or whether a small fanatical group of rabble rousers will remake the Nation into its own mold.

If we are to reach the point in our history as a Nation where a convicted felon is to be welcomed with open arms by civil rights enthusiasts, then I think it is fortunate that the American people know who is supporting this type of proposal.

If an inmate of a mental institution is to be given the right to participate in government without restriction, then those who advocate such a proposal should be made known to the American people so that the intelligent, God-fearing people of this Nation will fully realize who the advocates of civil rights legislation are.

Should convicted criminals like Alger Hiss be permitted to exercise the privilege of voting as to whom shall serve in the White House, or the Senate, or the House? Certain members of your Civil Rights Commission say they should because they are allowed to do so in a few States.

Certain members of the Commission propose a constitutional amendment which guarantees universal suffrage with only two qualifications—age and length of residence. Previous criminal records are of no consequence to these wild-eyed zealots.

"Forgive the felons; forget the Founding Fathers; foster fraternization of the races; foment discord among the people; fan the flames of civil strife; and further the cause of communism"—this should become the motto of the "Let's change America" members of the Civil Rights Commission.

Now, it does not take a detective to determine that the real control of the Civil Rights Commission, so far as certain members are concerned, is expressed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; and I want to say right here and now that the NAACP does not represent the fine colored citizens in my district, but I do not doubt for a moment that the NAACP does represent some parts of the United States.

And I do not doubt for a moment that the NAACP will be the first to scream discrimination when as effort is made to eliminate juvenile delinquency in the city of New York.

I do not doubt that the NAACP and civil rights enthusiasts will be Johnnie on the spot when a trial commences for the Negro knife wielders of the Brooklyn subways; or the Negro rapists and other Negro hoodlums who now control, for practical purposes, some of the largest cities in America.

Perhaps it is time that the American people were asked to go into the voting booths and vote "Yes" or "No" on the civil rights question. Perhaps if the people voiced their opinions in a voting booth instead of having their opinions voiced for them by professional do-gooders the results would startle even the NAACP.

Because, Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that there are more intelligent people in this Nation than some of the members of the Civil Rights Commission and the NAACP would have us believe. Perhaps an honest discussion of all aspects of civil rights will focus the attention of the Nation on the real problem which confronts us as a Nation—and that is, the civil rights of every American citizen walking down the streets of Washington, New York, Chicago, Los Angeles or any other place in the United States.

As long as equality under the law has been raised by certain members of the Civil Rights Commission, let us pursue it to its logical end. Did the wife of the deceased Deputy Secretary of Defense, Mrs. Donald Quarles, enjoy the equal protection of the law when she was assaulted by a Negro hoodlum in a respectable part of Washington?

Did the young student nurse enjoy the equal protection of the law when she was assaulted in a Brooklyn subway car the other morning by a Negro hoodlum? Do the crime rates of this Nation, released by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, indicating the percentage of criminal acts by Negro hoodlums, arouse your interest with regard to the equal protection of the law, everywhere in America? These are the rapists, the switch-blade artists, the dope addicts, the pistol wielders, the slashers, the sex fiends, and the drunken drivers. Go through these figures if you will and determine who is responsible for the major portion of the crimes committed in these same cities, and then ask yourself whether the equal protection of the laws has been made applicable on a fair basis to all citizens of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that instead of worrying about who votes, and for whom, in the South, we all better worry about who will live and for how long, in the North. It is time that the do-gooders in the North did some housecleaning of their own problems before they make further suggestions about how the South should live. Time and again this Congress and the American people have been propagandized by the civil-rights enthusiasts, but the real problem of the Nation, when it comes to civil rights or any rights whatsoever, is the right of survival in a community in which the Negro hoodlum element runs rampant.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that a poll be taken of the victims of Negro hoodlum assaults to determine their stand on civil rights. Then, I suggest we poll the mothers and fathers in the big cities of the United States where integrated schools have been forced on the people by their own legislators and ask them if they are in favor of integrated schools and the Negro hoodlums that their children are forced to associate with. Ask that group of mothers and fathers which is more important, a Federal registrar supervising Federal elections in the South or the lives of their children going to school in the North?

As an eye opener I enclose, for those who believe the facts and are worried about the conditions in Washington, a report on crime in the District of Columbia in 1958. These are cold facts and they are official facts. The percentage of crimes committed by Negroes in the District of Columbia is astounding. The Capital of the United States will soon acquire a new name, "The Negro Crime Capital of the World." What an appendage to place on the memory of the father of our country.

The report follows:

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in view of the circumstances, I ask unanimous consent to yield back my time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

SHOULD KHRUSHCHEV BE ALLOWED TO DESECRATE THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES?

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FEIGHAN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, there is much discussion going on as to whether the leaders of Congress will permit Khrushchev to address the House or a joint session of Congress. Unfortunately, there is very little thought being given to the implications involved in this issue. It appears that in this era of "me too" or in the spirit of "conformity" which grips our national life, individual thinking on the merits of this issue has been drowned out by the massive propaganda effort which has been launched from official Washington in support of Khrushchev's visit to our country. Some people in high positions are saying that a request from President Eisenhower to allow the Russian Dictator Khrushchev to speak before Congress would put them on the spot. In this I agree wholeheartedly. It would put them on the spot to strike a blow for national sanity, a blow for the dignity of representative government, and those whom the people have freely elected to Congress, a blow for the cause of human freedom and peace with justice. This can be done by rejecting such a request, whether it comes from President Eisenhower or his spokesmen in Congress.

After the dust has settled on the invitation episode and the people of our country have been able to take a second thought on this question, it is becoming increasingly evident to them that President Eisenhower has pulled the political boner of the century. The moral revulsion which has set in since the President announced his decision to invite Khrushchev as his official guest has struck fear and alarm into the ranks of the Republican high command. They are desperately in need of having the Congress and all the Members thereof associated with them in the political blunder of the century. By so doing they hope to distribute the guilt so widely that all others will fear to dissent on the acts and secret agreements which will likely follow in the wake of the political confusion which has resulted from this whole affair. This is what really lies back of any suggestion that Khrushchev be allowed to appear before the Congress.

Now, the question arises among Members of the Congress, "Who wants to associate himself with the political blunder of the century?" This is the basic question which Members must ask themselves if they are called upon to express their opinion on the desirability of Khrushchev addressing the Congress.

As Members of Congress contemplate this question they should bear in mind the following:

First. What caused the near collapse of NATO? Why did President Dwight Eisenhower have to rush off to Europe to assure our allies that he would make no secret deals with Khrushchev? Obviously the invitation to Khrushchev and its clear implications of evil.

Second. What forced the revered Chancellor Adenauer to make the degrading statement to Khrushchev that he was not strongly opposed to communism? Adenauer has been the symbol of a strong stand against the Russian Communists for the people of both West and East Germany for all these years we have been working to reconstruct Europe and build the military shield of NATO. Adenauer has been a symbol of the determined will of the German people to fight on for a free, united and democratic Germany. Look what the Khrushchev invitation has done to this great man of peace with justice.

Third. What caused President de Gaulle of France to make it known that he was planning a round of personal diplomacy with Khrushchev? This is a clear break in the united front of the European powers in their desire for collective security and against personal diplomacy, secret deals and agreements by the great powers at the expense of the small nations of the world. The invitation to Khrushchev, of course, is the reason.

Fourth. What caused the large Communist Parties of Italy and France to launch intensive membership drives and to proclaim that the United States has now retracted all its false claims against the Communist aggressors? Nothing but the invitation to Khrushchev.

Fifth. What caused Radio Moscow to launch a round-the-clock propaganda program against Chancellor Adenauer, calling for his overthrow—to be replaced by someone sympathetic to the new era of peaceful coexistence to be launched by Eisenhower and Khrushchev? The invitation to Khrushchev and the political victory he already feels is his.

Sixth. What has encouraged the Chinese Communists to carry out new campaigns of armed aggression in Laos, India, Nepal, and elsewhere in southeast Asia? Nothing but a determination made in Moscow that the invitation to Khrushchev represents another round of Munich appeasement, that the democracies are weak, that they will not fight for justice or human freedom.

Seventh. What will the millions and millions of non-Russian people enslaved behind the Bolshoi and Bamboo Curtains think of American promises to stand firm for a peace with justice and freedom for all nations and people? Will they trust our word on anything when they see Congress playing party to the individual who is the symbol of their slavery, the one who has buried them in despotism and now threatens to bury us in the same grave?

Eighth. What will the common man of the world think of the United States, when on the one hand the Congress passes the Captive Nations Week resolution, and then a few weeks later our President invites as his guest to our country, the symbol of human slavery? We will be regarded as specialists in duplicity, as unworthy of the sacred trust handed down from our founding fathers to preserve and extend the blessings of human freedom throughout the world. What else would or could they think if Congress allowed this individual to speak in these hallowed Halls?

In recent years the American people have been robbed of the full opportunity to make a choice on issues affecting the common good. The Republican Party has been trying to be all things to all people, claiming to be supporters of all those things for which the Democratic Party has been the champion and at the same time standing for all those things which the ultraconservative Republicans say are musts. The Democratic Party has been remiss in taking advantage of sharp divisions on public issues, in standing for what it believes and letting the electorate decide whether it is right or wrong. Now, here is a golden opportunity for the Democratic Party to take the issue of the day before the people. We can do this by making certain that the Republican leadership takes full and unshared responsibility for the Khrushchev visit to our country. We owe this to the two-party system which rests at the foundation to our representative form of Government and to the people who, in the final analysis, are the Government. The people must be given an opportunity to judge the merits of each of the two political parties on the basis of the position they take on the Khrushchev visit to our country. The only chance left to the Democratic Party to extend this opportunity to the people is by taking a firm stand against any request that Khrushchev be allowed to address Congress. There is no room for Monday morning quarterbacks on this issue.

I am well aware that many Members of the Republican Party stand firmly against the invitation to Khrushchev to visit our country and to allowing him to address Congress. I salute them for the stand they have taken, and I hope that in November of 1960 the people of their districts and States will remember the stand they have taken. It would be tragic in the extreme if they were associated in any way with the political blunder of the century.

I am also aware that some Members of the Democratic Party have associated themselves with this personal decision by President Eisenhower, Vice President Nixon, and Secretary of State Herter to allow the Russian leader Khrushchev to make a forced entry into the United States. It is not too late for them to change their position, it is not too late for them to disassociate themselves from the political boner of the century. I hope they have taken the time to study the repercussions, nationally and internationally, this affair has produced.

It is interesting to note that many stories are now being attributed to the Rockefeller campaign group to the effect that Vice President NIXON has eliminated himself as a serious contender for the Republican nomination because of the key role he played in this whole affair. This makes Nelson Rockefeller the last hope of the Republican Party in 1960—so say the vast corps of public opinion experts connected with the Rockefeller strategy group. Some people say Rockefeller is taking a gamble on this but the politically astute rate him a "shoo-in" for the Republican nomination. It also looks as though the Vice President has suddenly awakened to the blunder to which he is a party. Only a few nights ago he changed his tune as to why Khrushchev was invited to this country. His latest line is that it will afford us an opportunity to confront him with many aggressions of which he stands guilty. How different this is from the advice given by the Vice President when he returned from his campaign tour in Moscow a few weeks ago—recall that he asked the American people to treat Khrushchev with courtesy and consideration when he arrives in this country. The Vice President has always been known as an expert flip-flopper on basic political issues, but this time his coattail is firmly caught on the Khrushchev fence. It will take more than a cocker spaniel puppy to get him off the Khrushchev hook.

Now I suppose it will be said that it is out of order to make a political issue out of the President's invitation to Khrushchev. Let me answer the critics now. I am not making a political issue. All I am doing is recognizing that a crucial political issue has been created by the President through his invitation. Any schoolchild knows that this is a fact. The blame does not rest upon me or people of like mind but rather with those who are responsible for the invitation to Khrushchev.

Others, may try to drag out the old issue that foreign affairs is above the national political arena and not a fit subject for full-scale public debate in or out of the Congress. To them I say—the United States is still a Republic with a democratic form of government, the people are entitled to a choice in foreign policy, we owe it to them to give them a choice where a choice is possible. We must flush up all the facts surrounding a foreign policy decision which may spell the difference between war and peace. If we fail to do this we will have allowed our country to drift on the road to a dictatorship, we will certainly be moving in the direction of a British Foreign Office where decisions on foreign policy are taken without regard to the popular will of the people and where such decisions are made by a group of so-called experts who claim to know what is best for the people. We have representative government in this country and unless we take care we will lose this blessing. It is fitting and proper for all who may or may not be experts to voice their opinions on a foreign or domestic policy issue, but the decision on what course of action is to be taken must rest with elected officials who are subject to recall by the people. In the world in which we live foreign policy is as much a popular issue as is housing legislation, social security legislation, labor legislation and civil rights. Anyone who fails to recognize this reality of life in the next national elections had better remain home.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully request that if an attempt is made by the President or any of his spokesmen to have the Russian Dictator Khrushchev address the House or a joint session of the Congress that you put the issue squarely before Members of this body under conditions which would require each and every Member to stand up and be counted on the issue. To fail to do otherwise will make Congress a party to the political blunder of the century; it would deprive the American people of the opportunity to know exactly where their elected representatives stand on this issue. Such action would afford each Member of Congress a fair opportunity to publicly disassociate himself from the guilt which attaches to the basic immorality of having the leader of the international Communist conspiracy treated as a guest of our country. I ask for nothing more and look for nothing less from the distinguished Speaker of this House.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FEIGHAN. I am happy to yield to my distinguished colleague from Ohio.

Mr. LEVERING. I want to say to the gentleman that I recognize the significance of the statement he is making today. I wonder if the gentleman has any doubts about the fact that the Khrushchev visit is a diplomatic triumph for Soviet Russia, where the Soviet dictator will have the oportunity to use the White House as a sounding board in an attempt to increase his prestige in the eyes of the captive peoples of the world.

Mr. FEIGHAN. I think that there is no question but that your conclusion is absolutely correct.

Mr. LEVERING. I would ask the gentleman this further question, as to whether he thinks that this invitation to Premier Khrushchev suggests in any way that an effort is being made to exercise the art of compromise on the Congress of the United States.

Mr. FEIGHAN. I think definitely so. I think an effort is being made to associate the Congress with this guilt that attaches to the invitation that has been issued by President Eisenhower to Khrushchev.

Mr. LEVERING. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FEIGHAN. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PUCINSKI. I, too, would like to congratulate and commend the gentleman from Ohio for his forthright statement here today, in calling attention to the dangers confronting our people by the invitation of Czar Khrushchev to this country. It is lamentable, indeed, that those who sent this invitation failed to recognize the devastating effect that this visit is going to have, not on our country, because I think the American people are much too intelligent, much too smart, too enlightened not to recognize the Khrushchev visit for exactly what it is. I do not have any particular fear that it might break down any great effort on the part of this country against communism, but I do agree with the gentleman that the greatest danger and the greatest demoralizing effect is going to be on the captive nations, the people behind the Iron Curtain, that we have been trying so desperately for the last 14 years to hold, at least in spirit, on our side. Just imagine the wealth of propaganda material that Czar Khrushchev is going to take back to Russia with him after he leaves this country, when he takes back pictures of the Communist flag flying over our airfield when his plane is landing, and the flag flying over the White House and the other Government agencies. This is a devastating result of his visit, and it is unfortunate that those who engineered this visit did not realize it. I congratulate the gentleman for his statement and for calling this to the attention of the House.

Mr. FEIGHAN. I thank the gentleman. I wholeheartedly agree with you. You have put your finger on the triumph that will be Khrushchev's and its tragic effect upon the free world. The moral indignation that has been aroused in the people of the United States is proof evident that the people of the United States will not become soft on communism by President Eisenhower's invitation to Khrushchev and Khrushchev's presence in our country.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FEIGHAN. I yield.

Mr. LEVERING. I wonder if my distinguished colleague from Ohio will agree that perhaps all Americans should at this time recall the admonition of Winston Churchill, still one of the world's greatest statesmen, who said on that occasion when the Prime Minister of England, Neville Chamberlain, came back from Munich waving the Anglo-German agreement and proclaiming peace in our time:

> If we do not stand up to the dictators now, we shall only prepare the day when we shall have to stand up to them under far more adverse conditions. Two years ago, it was safe. Three years ago, it was easy, and four years ago a mere dispatch might have rectified the position. But where shall we be a year hence?

Mr. FEIGHAN. I thoroughly agree with you that all Americans, and particularly the present administration, should recall and carefully examine that admonition. I regret exceedingly that this present administration has not seen fit to follow that admonition of Winston Churchill, then Prime Minster of Great Britain.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FEIGHAN. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PORTER. I appreciate the gentleman's concern, but I want to point out that this is a two-way street, of course. Although Khrushchev may get propaganda advantages—and no doubt will try to get them when he comes here, and I agree with the gentleman—Mr. Eisenhower is going over there, and certainly in a world of ideas and facts, so far as comparison goes, we here in the United States, with our form of government, have nothing to fear.

Mr. FEIGHAN. The United States has nothing to fear for its own internal security, while Khrushchev is in the United States. However, Khrushchev's visit is designed by the Kremlin to weaken the strength of the alliances of the free world and when that strength is weakened, our own internal security is weakened.

But I think the gentleman misses the point entirely. The mere fact that Khrushchev is over here will be an indication to all the people who are captive, suffering under the inhuman yoke of Russian Communist tyranny, as well as those who are free and those free people now fighting against aggression, such as people in Laos and other places in Asia where Communist aggression is going on now, will be made to think that they cannot believe what the United States has said, namely, that we will support the captive people in their fight for liberty and individual freedom. That is where the danger is. When Eisenhower goes over to Moscow, in the first place the great masses of people there and in the non-Russian nations enslaved by Moscow will not have an opportunity to hear him. Whether President Eisenhower will get on the TV or the radio in Moscow and reiterate that he stands by the promises of his 1952 and 1956 election campaigns, that he stands for the peaceful liberation of all the people enslaved by Russian communism, I do not know. We can discuss that later, although I do not think he will. I wish he would.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I certainly agree that so far as this visit is misrepresented so as to make it look as though we are softening our stand against communism, that is a disgrace and something we should try to prevent. But so far as our attitude toward dictators is concerned, so far as this is an expression of a policy that was agreed upon earlier this year, recommended by Milton Eisenhower, namely, the formal handshake for dictators and the warm embrace for democratic leaders, so far as this can be a formal handshake, a matter of essential communication, then I say that it can be done. But if it is misrepresented then I think we had better look to our USIA and our other agencies and see that the peoples of the world do understand that we are not turning soft on communism.

Mr. FEIGHAN. The people of the world, in my opinion, are getting the idea that the present administration is getting soft on communism because of President Eisenhower's invitation to Khrushchev.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FEIGHAN. I yield.

Mr. PUCINSKI. The gentleman from Ohio spoke of the great blunder of the administration in inviting Czar Khrushchev to this country. Would it be the gentleman's opinion that we are compounding that blunder when the President goes to Russia?

Mr. FEIGHAN. I think so, very definitely.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks at this point I include the following letter:

> QUEEN OF THE HOLY ROSARY SCHOOL,
> Overland Park, Kans., August 31, 1959.
> Representative NEWELL A. GEORGE,
> House of Representatives,
> Washington, D.C.
>
> HONORED SIR: We are a group of educators who wish to voice our disapproval of the threatened Khrushchev visit to our country.
> Why must we be forced to the indignity of having a murderer, a liar, a dictator, a despiser of freedom, a slave driver, a God hater darken the door of our country—our "Nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."
>
> It is hard to believe that our Nation's leaders plan to welcome the "bloody butcher of Hungary." Please, as our Representative, register our strong disapproval of the welcome that is being planned by Washington officials for this enemy of the American people.
>
> We can see no indication that the proposed visit can result in any possible good for any peoples of the free world. Anti-Communist morale will certainly be weakened by our welcome to the number one Communist leader; and the freedom-loving peoples, the slaves of Khrushchev, will be forced to despise our weakness in dealing with the enemy of all freedom.
>
> As sincere, practical American citizens, it seems inexcusable to us, to give the undeserved prestige and unwarranted dignity to Khrushchev, as well as to allow the shameful triumph of Communist propaganda that will be the result of this disgraceful courtesy to the avowed enemy of all free peoples.
>
> As citizens in a nation that has always considered belief in God a necessary prerequisite for just and efficient self-rule of free people, we believe that the invitation that has been extended to Khrushchev is a serious act of immorality by the Government of the United States of America, and furthermore, we consider it a great national sin against God in whom we profess to believe and to trust.
> We respectfully urge you, our Representative, to insist that the arch-murderer of Moscow postpone his visit to our country until he shows by his treatment of the peoples behind the Iron Curtain that he is no longer the enemy of freedom nor the enemy of God.
>
> Praying that God will give you the grace to do what is best for our common good, we are,
>
> Respectfully yours,

RETIREMENT OF DR. STANTON GARFIELD

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. EDMONDSON). Under previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, Surgeon General Leroy E. Burney of the U.S. Public Health Service announced on September 1, 1959, the retirement of Dr. Stanton Garfield, a medical officer in the Service's commissioned corps, and grandson of James A. Garfield, 20th President of the United States. Dr. Garfield is leaving the Service at the mandatory retirement age of 64.

Dr. Garfield was appointed to the PHS commissioned corps in 1944. His first assignment with the Service was as a medical officer with the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration mission to Yugoslavia from 1944 to 1946. At the time of his retirement, he was in the Service's Division of International Health, where he served as fellowship program director and training officer. Dr. Garfield has been responsible for planning training programs for foreign health and medical personnel in the United States under sponsorship of the International Cooperation Administration and the World Health Organization.

Prior to entering the Public Health Service, Dr. Garfield was in general pediatric practice in my own city of Concord, Mass., from 1927 until 1944. In addition to his private practice, for 17 years he was school physician to the Fenn School in Concord and was on the teaching staffs of Harvard Medical School and Harvard School of Public Health. He also served as head of the Medical Division of the Concord Office of Civil Defense.

In 1946, Dr. Garfield went on inactive duty status in the commissioned corps to accept a teaching position in maternal and child health at Harvard Schools of Medicine and Public Health and to serve on the Concord Board of Health. In 1953, he returned to the service as an active duty medical officer.

Dr. Garfield was born in Cuyahoga County, Ohio, but has lived most of his life in New England. His father was Harry A. Garfield, eldest son of President Garfield, and a former president of Williams College.

Dr. Garfield received his bachelor of arts degree from Williams College in 1917 and his medical degree from Harvard Medical School in 1922, and did postgraduate work in pathology in Vienna. In 1944 he received the master of public health degree from Harvard School of Public Health.

He is a member of the American Academy of Pediatrics, the New England Pediatric Society, the Massachusetts Public Health Association, American Public Health Association, and American Medical Association.

I am very proud to count Dr. Garfield one of my constituents in the town of Concord, Mass. He is a very illustrious son of a great President and a fine and distinguished father.

Dr. Garfield's contributions to the public health of America and to international health has been very great. The Nation is very much in his debt. May he continue for years to give of his fine talents to the promotion of public health.

THE 86TH CONGRESS HAS BEEN CONSTRUCTIVE AND HAS ACCOMPLISHED MUCH IN THE PUBLIC INTEREST NOTWITHSTANDING THE DIFFICULTIES ENCOUNTERED BY A DIVIDED GOVERNMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. EVINS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, the 86th Congress and its predecessor, the 85th Congress, will occupy a special niche in the history of our Government. For the past 5 years we have seen a Government in which the responsibility has been divided between the two parties. The executive branch has been entrusted by the people into the hands of a Republican President, whereas the Congress has been entrusted into the hands of the Democratic Party. This particular instance is notable first because this division of the Government has existed now a longer period, and secondly, because the Democratic majority in the Congress has been enlarged every 2 years—until today it is one of the largest majorities any party has ever enjoyed.

This division of the Government has brought with it many serious problems and has made the position of both the executive branch and the Congress more difficult. Such a division inevitably brings with it conflicts in basic philosophies and in points of view on particular issues. In recent weeks these conflicts have been intensified and dramatized by the President's exercise, on several occasions, of his veto powers. These vetoes have nullified many months of work by the Congress in various legislative areas. The Congress has also been threatened with vetoes of other legislation it now has under consideration.

Our history shows that our Government works best when both the legislative and the executive functions are entrusted to the same party. This is true for several reasons. First, when the people have elected a President and a Congress of the same party they have also at the same time clearly indicated a preference for the principles and the policies for which that party stands; and, therefore, there is no confusion, or there is less likely to be confusion, about what the people desire the Government to do on the various issues of importance.

Secondly, although ours is a Government of divided responsibility, both commonsense and the lessons of history indicate clearly that our Government operates best under a working partnership between the executive and the legislative branches. Such a working partnership is obviously easier when both the President and the majority of the Members of the Congress represent the same party and, therefore, the same basic philosophies on the issues of the day.

When the President is of the same party, the Congress, of course, should not blindly follow Presidential leadership or serve merely as a rubber stamp or surrender to the President its own responsibility to make the legislative decisions itself. But, unquestionably, an understanding and self-respecting cooperation between the Congress and the President leads to the most effective Government under our Constitution.

Fortunately, during the most critical years of our history such a partnership has prevailed. Conversely, undoubtedly the lowest points in our history have occurred when there has been no effective working partnership between the President and the executive branch and the Congress.

In 1952, following our traditional pattern, the people elected both a Republican President and a Republican Congress. Apparently unhappy with the result of this arrangement, in 1954, in the congressional elections, the people returned a Democratic majority to the Congress.

The 84th Congress was therefore the first to be faced with the necessity of deciding whether it would endeavor to try to make this divided Government work or whether it would merely stand in opposition and obstruct the program of a Republican President. Under similar conditions the leadership of the other party has chosen the latter course. We all recall that a distinguished former Republican Senator stated the philosophy that the function of the opposition was just to oppose. The leadership of the 84th Congress, however, took a more responsible position. It decided that, without abandoning the principles for which the party stood and campaigned, it would not bring our Government to a standstill but instead would endeavor to work and to cooperate and do the best possible under the circumstances.

In 1956, the people clearly approved this responsible position. Despite the pleas of both parties and both presidential candidates to elect a President and a Congress of the same party, the people again elected a Republican President and a Democratic Congress and with a much larger majority. The 85th Congress again faced the choice of either opposing and obstructing or of trying constructively to work and cooperate for the national interest.

Few Congresses earned the respect and approbation that the 85th Congress received when it completed its work last year. In the elections of last year the people clearly approved the constructive work of the Democratically controlled 85th Congress by electing a Congress with the largest Democratic majority in more than 20 years.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot assume that when the people speak as emphatically as they spoke in the last election that they did not know what they were doing.

If we believe in our form of Government, if we believe that this is a Government by the people, we must accept the judgment of the people as superior to our own when it differs from our judgment. Those who believe in our kind of democracy cannot abdicate their responsibilities as citizens, much less their responsibilities as members of the Government serving the people, simply because the people do not agree with them. Much less, can we obstruct the will of the people when it is plainly and emphatically stated and expressed, as it surely was in the last congressional elections. We must make the Government work for the people and this Congress has endeavored to do so.

The differences in the policies between the Democratic Congress and the Republican President manifestly have been many. The issues which were presented to the electorate were the very issues on which there is division here today—the farm problem, the problems of our urban communities, the problems of our depressed areas, the housing problem, economic conditions, adequate defense, the problem of catching up with the dramatic Russian progress in missile and space vehicles. The people heard both the Republican and the Democratic position on these issues. Overwhelmingly, they elected candidates to Congress who espoused the Democratic positions. To maintain that there was no relation between the election of a Democratic Congress and the policies that the Democratic Party stood for would be to deny intelligence to our citizens.

The President and his administration, however, have held stubbornly to the same positions that the people repudiated in the elections and instead of bowing to the will of the people and making some concessions in their own policies to make them conform, in some degree at least, to the mandate of the people. The President and his administration made it clear from the moment this Congress met that they would not relax their opposition to the program of the Democratic Party.

The Democratic leadership of this 86th Congress has tried again to arrive at some workable arrangement with the President and his administration. Toward this end, the Democratic leadership has tried to be reasonable; it has met the administration more than half way on most of the controversial issues facing the Nation. In my opinion, the people of the country have continued to elect and to reelect Democratic Congresses because even under trying and difficult circumstances, such as we face today, the Democratic leadership has striven for progress and consistently made records of constructive achievement.

It takes two to make a working partnership and, Mr. Speaker, I submit that there has been little effort on the part of the executive branch to make any concessions. Instead we have seen on the most critical issues a stubborn insistence that our legislation agree in almost every particular with the policies and the point of view of the administration. This is plainly evident in the veto messages that have accompanied the objections of the President to a number of actions taken by this Congress. For example, consider the vetoes of the two farm bills we passed this year and the one we passed last year. Everybody is aware that the present farm policies have been disastrous failures. Certainly the farmer has not profited from them.

During the past 6 years the course of inflation has increased the average income of most Americans. Only the farmers have not participated in this increase in income. The farmers' net income has been on the average 19 percent less during the last 4 years than it was in 1952. In that year our farmers had a total net income of 15.3 billions. In the past 4 years the net income of our farmers has averaged only 11.9 billions.

With farming becoming less profitable, millions of farmers have left the farms and some 700,000 farms have literally gone to seed. In 1952, our farm population was 24.2 million on 5.4 million farms. Last year our farm population was only 20.8 million on 4.7 million farms. In other words, we have had a decrease of 14 percent in our farm population and 13 percent in our farms under the plows.

The theory of Secretary of Agriculture Benson has been that if prices were lowered production of farm products would decrease and surpluses would be reduced.

As a matter of fact, this has not happened at all. Although we have had fewer farms and fewer people working on farms, the output per farm has increased by almost 20 percent. As a result of this, the surplus crops owned by the Commodity Credit Corporation have increased by 5½ times in the 6 years since this administration came into office. As of January 1, 1953, the Commodity Credit Corporation held a little over a billion dollars worth of surplus commodities. On January 1, 1959, it held almost $5½ billion worth. The Commodity Credit Corporation estimates that in 1960 there will be another increase of about $3.6 billion which would bring the total to almost $9 billion.

The cost of administering the farm price support program has also increased by staggering proportions. In 1952, it cost us $34.6 million to administer the price support program. Last year it cost us $365 million, more than 10 times as much. This is merely the cost of administering the CCC surplus program. The other costs in the Department of Agriculture have also risen. The number of employees in the Department of Agriculture has also increased—increased from 67,000 on January 1, 1953 to 85,000 on January 1 of this year—an increase of 17 percent.

Meanwhile, the cost of everything the farmer buys has risen. To give you several examples in terms that are meaningful to the farmer, let us make a few comparisons. In 1952, a farmer could buy a tractor with 1,000 bushels of wheat; today it takes 1,400 bushels. The cotton farmer in 1952 could buy this tractor with 5,340 pounds of cotton, but in 1958 it took 7,500 pounds. Thinking in terms of the things for his home, in 1952 it took 66 bushels of wheat to buy an electric washer; in 1958 it took 87 bushels. For the cotton farmer in 1952 it took 350 pounds, whereas in 1958 it took 460 pounds.

In other words, we see that the farmer would have to grow 50 percent more corn or cotton this year to buy for himself and his family needed farm and household machinery and appliances.

Thus there has developed through these policies a vicious circle—reducing farm supports reduces farm prices. To try to get the same income, the farmer has to raise more crops. But, when crops are increased, prices go down further. This is so simple and so plain that I cannot see how anybody can fail to realize that as long as the sliding scale and declining price theory is in operation, production will be encouraged, crops production and surpluses will be increased; the farmer's net income will continue to decrease and the net effect is a vicious downward spiral. For the 20 years previous to 1952, we had a farm policy that worked. It was not perfect—there were many mistakes made but it did raise the farmers' income; it did improve his economic position and put him in a position of enjoying to a large degree the high standard of living that our laboring, business, and professional people enjoyed. That policy was based on sound psychology. It recognized the simple fact that the only way a farmer could be encouraged to actually reduce production was to insure him against a fall in income. A farmer did not mind reducing his production if the reduced production brought him the same or higher income. Crop loans, therefore, were tied in with acreage reductions. The farmer knew that if he grew less he would nevertheless not have to sacrifice his family's standard of living. We did have some surpluses but these were small in comparison with what they are today. In retrospect, we can well call those 20 years before 1952 the "golden years" of the farmer.

It is impossible, of course, to retrace our steps for 6 years and get back to where we were before the present farm disaster started. But, it is possible to enact a realistic farm policy based on the sound principle of reducing farm production.

Unfortunately, all of our efforts to do this have been nullified by Presidential vetoes. The administration has made it clear that it will not accept any farm bill except one that Mr. Benson is permitted to write.

The differences between the policies of the President and his administration on the housing program on the one hand and those of the Democratic Party on the other hand again illustrate our difficulties. In the areas of our country where housing and urban renewal were among the most important and pressing problems, the voters overwhelmingly elected those who maintain the position that action needs to be taken to alleviate housing conditions in our cities and to maintain an orderly growth of adequate housing throughout the country. As we know, when the Congress wrote a housing bill in this session a modest, moderate bill was written to meet the position of the administration more than half way. Yet the President vetoed the bill. And when another bill was passed going still farther to meet the administration position, it too has been vetoed.

A similar situation exists in respect to the program for the development of our natural resources. As we know, earlier this year we passed and sent to the President the public works appropriations bill which provided funds for our great program of water resource development. The President has vetoed this bill.

In enacting this bill the Appropriations Committees of both Houses, and the Congress itself, did not accept the no-new-starts policy which was expressed in the budget presented by the Budget Bureau and the President. The action of the Congress in approving this bill evidences a rejection of the no-new-starts policy and a firm approval of a reasonable program of continuing construction of worthwhile and needed projects and studies of other future projects by both the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation of the Department of Interior.

It will be recalled that in submitting the public works budget the President and the Budget Bureau favored a policy of continuing the construction of projects already begun but of not undertaking any new starts or even the planning of new projects. The Appropriations Committee disagreed with this policy and expressed itself in favor of carrying on the program of water resource development in an orderly and uninterrupted manner. The Subcommittee on Public Works Appropriations approved and recommended funds for 37 new construction starts and for the planning of 11 other projects. The House approved this recommendation in passing the bill.

The Senate added 30 additional starts and 33 new planning studies of other projects. The conferees compromised on 52 new starts and 30 planning studies. This decision by the conferees was accepted by both bodies in the passage of the public works appropriation bill for 1960.

It should be noted that the additional new starts and studies involve an added cost of less than $25 million over the budget as submitted to the Congress. So that, although the funds appropriated are close to the recommendation of the President, the policy underlying the use of the funds is quite different.

Apparently it is the philosophy of the Budget Bureau and the administration that the principal function of the public works program is to provide employment in poor times and that in good times we should stop or delay the development of the Nation's water resources.

In passing this appropriation bill, the Congress has refused to take such a narrow and limited view, and has, instead, looked upon our water resource development program as a positive program to develop the capabilities of our Nation for the continued growth and prosperity of the entire country. These programs are more than expenditures—they are investments in America. Our Nation must have a well-planned and continuing program of both construction and planning; in the long run this is more economical, practical, and represents sound policy.

Granting that in times of economic stress we can also use this program as an economic stimulant, it would nevertheless be foolish to restrict the surveying and planning of any new projects. Only with intelligent and deliberate planning can we make sure that we have on the shelf, as it were, well-thought-out projects that the Nation will need if an economic emergency should develop.

Therefore, in repudiating the no-new-starts policy, the Congress in my view acted wisely and with a forward-looking perspective, to provide for an orderly development of our resources at this time in step with the growth of our Nation.

Mr. Speaker, the veto power is an important instrument of the President's power. But, when it is used repeatedly in circumstances like these the question arises as to the proper use of this power in the public interest. The President does not have the item veto power, but he has, in effect, vetoed many items—and blocks of items.

It would be presumptuous for me to advise the President on the use of the veto power. I have always had the greatest respect for General Eisenhower as a military officer and, in fact, I look back upon my service under his command, as one of the high spots in my life. I also have the highest respect for the Office of the President of whatever party he may be and for the prerogatives of the President. As a Member of Congress, I am jealous, and I believe properly so, of the powers and prerogatives of the Congress, and I would be resentful if the President tried to tell the Congress how it should discharge its responsibilities under the Constitution. I have no doubt the President is sincere in his personal disapproval of some of the policies reflected in the actions of this Congress. But perhaps he does not fully realize that in exercising his veto power to disapprove measures enacted by this Congress he is not only expressing a difference in point of view between himself and the Congress but also a difference in point of view between himself and the people who have elected this Congress.

Under our system of divided government, with its checks and balances, each of the three branches must recognize and respect the responsibility and functions of the other two. Despite the fundamental differences of opinion and philosophy, the Democratic leadership of the Congress has respected and recognized the responsibilities and prerogatives of the President and the executive branch. It has refrained from opposition for the sake of opposition. It has respected the President's prerogatives to differ with the Congress. Recognizing those differences, it has tried to reconcile them as much as it could without selling out the constitutional responsibility of the Congress to determine the policies of our Government. I doubt that our history can show a similar attitude on the part of a Congress dominated by the party that is in opposition to the party of the President.

Despite all these difficulties of operating under a divided government and with a constant threat of veto, the 1st session of the 86th Congress has a constructive record that attests to the determination of the Democratic leadership to make a Government work in the public interest under these most trying of circumstances. I think it might be well if we reviewed briefly the things we have accomplished in this 1st session of the 86th Congress.

We recall that as this session began there were partisan cries about wild spending and wild spenders and that the President sought and claimed for himself the position as sole guardian of economy in our Government.

Mr. Speaker, we of course know what the facts on the budget are. We know that in the past 6 years we have seen the highest peacetime budgets in history. We know also that every year the President has submitted to the Congress a budget higher than for the previous year. We know also that every year except 1958, when we were facing a recession, the Congress has cut the President's budget severely. In spite of all this, the budget has continued to rise and with it the deficits that have added to our national debt, which now stands at the highest level in history.

We know that the Appropriations Committee of the House recommended this year and the House voted this year to cut more than $2 billion from the budget submitted by the President. Although the other body has partially restored some of these cuts, we know that the total appropriations voted by this Congress will still be well below the recommendations of the President.

Mr. Speaker, we welcome the interest of the President and this administration in a more economical Government; but in view of the above facts, it is a little strange to see the administration trying to establish itself as the sole guardian of the Treasury.

The 86th Congress, like its immediate predecessors the Democratic-controlled 84th and 85th Congresses, has tried to provide adequately for the vital needs of our Nation but without waste or extravagance. The record of these three Congresses speaks for itself, and I am sure that this was one of the principal reasons why the voters of our Nation have chosen to entrust the Congress in the hands of the Democratic Party.

Perhaps the most important concern of the 86th Congress has been that of insuring that our defensive position is adequate to meet the threatening challenge of any possible enemies. Of the some $72.5 billion the Congress will appropriate, no less than $46.5 billion or 64 percent will go for national defense. The Defense Department will get approximately $40.5 billion; the Atomic Energy Commission, whose work is largely related to our defense, will get $2.6 billion; the National Space Agency will get $450 million; and the mutual security program will receive between $3¼ and $3½ billion.

We all know that the voting of billions in funds for defense is not in itself a guarantee of an adequate defensive posture. We will recall that the 85th Congress reorganized the Defense Department to improve its efficiency and to eliminate the waste of effort and the duplications which, in part, were responsible for our falling behind Soviet Russia in the vital missile and space research fields.

In this session, the appropriate committees of the House have continued their investigations and studies of the Defense Department and pointed out areas where further improvement was needed. Among other things, we enacted legislation to reorganize the Navy Department for a more efficient utilization of its resources in the development and acquisitions of naval armaments.

The Appropriations Committee, in apportioning the funds for the Defense Department, has recommended certain changes in policies which would eliminate additional wastes and bring about a more efficient use of the funds and facilities provided the Defense Department.

This Congress has extended the draft for an additional 4 years. This was not a pleasant task. As a nation, it is still hard for us to become reconciled to the necessity of having to draft our young men into the Armed Forces. Nevertheless, recognizing that these difficult times require the most effective mobilization of all our resources, both human and material, the Congress has extended the draft.

Our National Guard and Reserve units are, of course, a vital arm of our defensive strength. As a matter of fact throughout our history the National Guard and our Reserves have traditionally been our reservoir of trained soldiers, sailors, and marines.

In all our recent wars our National Guard and Reserve units have been our national lifesavers. They have provided us with organized units which could be sent directly to the fields of battle without much previous, additional training. We all recall that during the last war several of our National Guard divisions were able to hold back the forces of Japan in the Pacific while here at home we raised additional strength through the draft. Our National Guard and Reserve units have also provided cadres of organization which could be filled in with quickly trained draftees. In short, it is doubtful whether, without the National Guard and Reserve units, we would have had time enough to raise and train the great armies we had to have before we could gain the initiative and conquer the enemies of democracy. Nevertheless, for some reason or other, there have been those who have wanted to cut down the National Guard and the Reserves. Once again this year the Congress has had to make sure that the strength of the National Guard and the Reserves was not reduced and that these vital arms of our defense could continue to serve our Nation in the future as they have in the past.

Another important action we took was to extend the Renegotiations Act providing for the recovery of excess profits on defense contracts. The investigations of the Comptroller General this year which brought out that a number of our largest industries were guilty of overestimating their costs on contracts and thus made excessive profits, once again point out the vital need for continuing this authority to renegotiate contracts in the defense field.

It will be recalled that last year as a result of the sputnik crisis we established the National Space Agency and entrusted it with the responsibility of carrying on research in space exploration. This year we provided the Space Agency with a total of nearly one-half billion dollars for its work in the coming year. Although our progress in this field may not be as rapid as some optimists have forecast, it is notable that despite many failures we have also had many significant successes. It is difficult we all know to establish a crash program in basic research. But, with the funds made available to the National Space Agency, the National Science Foundation, and to the research branches of the Armed Forces, and with the determination of American scientists to succeed in this vital field, I believe that this Nation can look forward to an accelerated and successful program in this field in the coming years.

The sputnik crisis also made clear to this Nation that we needed to accelerate our education of well-qualified scientists, engineers, and technicians. Last year the Congress took several vital steps in this direction and in this session we have continued to act positively in this field. One of the most significant actions we have taken is to greatly increase the appropriations for scholarships, fellowships, and scientific training teachers' programs of the National Science Foundation.

In other areas of domestic legislation, this 1st session of the 86th Congress is also building a constructive record of solid achievement. From the point of view of the people of the district and State which I have the honor to represent, one of the most vital actions of this Congress has been the enactment into law, after 4 long years of effort, of the TVA self-financing bill. With the passage of this legislation the great uncertainty regarding future growth and financing that has hung over this great agency of our Government has been removed. The TVA will be able to continue to serve not only the 6 million people of the Tennesseee Valley and the South but also all of the people of the United States. It will serve them directly because half of all the power that TVA generates goes to Federal agencies such as the Atomic Energy Commission, the Arnold Engineering Development Center, and the Army's Redstone Arsenal Rocket and Missile Center. It will serve the people of the entire Nation also by continuing to serve as an example of how mass production of power, sold at low cost, can expand the horizons of our life by giving us electrical help in industry, on the farm, and in the home to relieve the drudgery of physical effort. With the uncertainty of TVA's future removed, the Tennessee Valley can also look forward with some assurance to participating in the growth and progress of the Nation with other areas.

The long battle to preserve the TVA has resulted in a triumph for the TVA, and I may say also a triumph for the Nation.

This session of the Congress will be remembered for enactment of a labor reform bill to curb and correct the abuses in the labor-management field revealed by the McClellan investigating committee. The revelations of this committee shocked the Nation and demanded a correction and elimination of the abuses which some unscrupulous labor leaders have been guilty of by exploiting the unions and the funds contributed by the members for their own selfish benefit. As we know, both Houses this week have acted favorably on labor bills and with the President's signature the Labor Management Act of 1959 will soon become law.

This Congress will go down in history because during it our Union reached the number of 50 States. Last session we admitted Alaska to the Union as a full fledged State and this year Hawaii was admitted. Thus, the horizon of our Nation has been expanded into the Pacific and far to the northwest. Our flag, which for 45 years had 48 stars, will now have 50, as our Nation has grown in strength and world status.

This Congress has been forced to provide for a temporary increase in the debt limit. This was another unpleasant duty which I am sure we would all have preferred to avoid. Certainly, it is time for us to consider ways and means for dealing with this great and enlarged national debt. Times of prosperity are times in which the debt should be reduced. Instead of that, we have seen it increased by many billions of dollars in the past few years.

It is necessary that our Nation make plans to start an orderly reduction of the national debt.

Largely because of the need for revenue, this Congress has not been able to give serious consideration to reforming our present structure of taxes. We have taken some steps in this session, to close a few loopholes and to equalize the tax burden to a limited degree. We repealed the tax on local telephone calls and reduced the tax on transportation of persons and made other minor excise tax adjustments. The Congress also closed loopholes in the income taxes of life insurance companies and revised the schedule of taxes for these companies.

In one area our program of development of our Nation in the public interest did not run into a veto. We extended the Federal Airport Aid Act to continue the Federal partnership with the States in the development of airports. This has been made all the more necessary by the fact that our airlines are beginning to use jet planes which require longer runways; and also because air traffic is growing tremendously.

Our coal industry has been suffering a very serious depression in the last few years. The availability of natural gas as a fuel for household heating and power generation have greatly reduced the consumption of coal. To find new markets and new uses for coal, the Congress this year established a Coal Research and Development Commission. I might venture to point out one of the steps this Commission could recommend would be the encouragement of private utilities to use electric power for house heating. The TVA has had a tremendous success in this field and partly because of it, the TVA has become the greatest single consumer of coal in the world. The TVA has proved that the use of coal in this way is an economical and convenient utilization of our great coal resources. Should the Nation's private utilities go as far as the TVA in this respect I am sure the coal problem would approach a solution.

The increasing concentration of economic power through mergers and purchases by large companies of smaller ones continues to present a problem in the enforcement of our antitrust laws. In this connection this Congress has taken a few steps in the direction of assuring better enforcement of our antitrust laws. Among other actions, the Congress enacted a law to expedite procedures for enforcements of cease and desist orders by the Federal Trade Commission. Appropriations for antitrust prosecutions have been provided and a number of other measures are under consideration by the appropriate committees of the Congress for this purpose. It is certainly to be hoped in the interest of our small business communities and in the public interest that those agencies which are charged with preserving our free enterprise system shall have the means and the tools to do their job effectively.

In the field of social security the Congress revised the Railroad Retirement and Unemployment Compensation Acts, increasing the benefits to the retired employees and making some readjustments and revisions in these acts. The Congress also extended benefits of temporary unemployment compensation for 3 additional months to the jobless whose State payments had expired. This was an extension of the legislation we enacted last year, which I have no doubt had an influence in generating the recovery from last year's recession.

Congress extended programs for training public health personnel and advance training for public nursing and authorized funds for this program. We extended the coverage of the Social Security Act to bring nonprofessional school district employees into the social security program, authorized an increase in the limitation on the special school milk program to $85 million for 1960 and to $90 million for 1961, and increased by $3 million the authorized expenditures under this milk program for 1959.

The Congress also revised the program of non-service-connected pensions to veterans, their widows and children. There have been many inequities in the operations of our veterans' pension program. For example, under the old law, the widows and orphans of World War II and Korean war veterans can benefit only if the veterans had a service-connected disability. The new Veterans' Pension Act of 1959 places the widows and orphans of those who fought in these last two conflicts on the same footing—with the same pension rights—as those of World War I veterans. The law also provides for a new system of pensions with payments proportioned to the need. It provides a graduated scale of payments, with the highest payments going to those with the greatest needs and the smallest income from other sources.

The Congress appropriated a total of $3,300 million for pensions and compensations for veterans for the next year. This is an increase of nearly $50 million over the funds available for the current year.

Increased appropriations have also been provided for the veterans' hospital and medical program. The medical program of the Veterans' Administration has improved in recent years, but it still suffers from the lack of sufficient beds and hospital facilities. The new veterans' hospitals authorized by Congress recently, which are now being constructed, will ease this situation. As these new hospitals go into service and present ones are modernized to provide for more efficient service there should be an improvement in the medical care of our veterans.

This Congress has also authorized $100 million for direct housing loans to veterans. It has written legislation to revise the control of the estates of incompetent veterans to assure greater protection for the veterans and their families.

Another act provides that medical care for veterans temporarily living abroad include those with peacetime service incurred disability. With these and other additions to our great veterans benefits programs our Nation is providing the greatest benefits for our veterans of any nation in the world.

As previously pointed out our efforts to enact an improved farm program were nullified in this session by two Presidential vetoes. But we did enact some helpful legislation for agriculture. For example, we broadened the power of the Crop Insurance Board to extend its program into additional counties. Congress transferred the responsibility for making appraisals of farms from the Farm Credit Administration to the Federal land banks. We extended for 2 years the provisions of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, authorizing refinancing of loans of family-size farms and provided appropriations for our vast catalog of agriculture acts and progress.

Our international relations are, of course, of great concern in every session of the Congress. Once more, recognizing the need to support our friends and allies, the Congress extended the mutual security program and voted appropriations of approximately $3 billion to carry on this program in the coming year. We provided also for the establishment and participation by our country in an Inter-American Development Bank for loans to friendly allies. Congress authorized an increase in the U.S. subscription to the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank of Reconstruction and Development.

I have reviewed only the highlights of our activities and I have covered largely only the most important legislative enactments. The Congress, of course, has continued its many studies by the various committees which will lead to additional legislative recommendations. I have not stressed also the many important decisions the Congress has made regarding the operations of our Government in the course of appropriating funds for the manifold branches of our Government. Some of the most important actions we have taken have been taken through the appropriation bills. This is a record in which all those who have served in the 86th Congress can take pride. It is a record that is the best testimonial to the effective and responsible Democratic leadership in the Congress. It is a record which should have the approval of the people of the Nation. It is a record that proves that the leadership of this Congress has risen successfully to the challenge of these difficult times.

Many problems remain for solution—such as the farm problem. If the spirit of cooperation which has been evidenced on the side of Congress will be reciprocated fully by the executive branch this and other problems will be solved.

The problems of a divided government are many—but a spirit of cooperation and an attitude of willingness to work for the national need and welfare will result in more success and advancement for all our citizens in the public interest.

Perfection is never achieved but this Congress has worked diligently and consistently in the public interest of all America.

STANDARDS FOR ISSUING PASSPORTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to discuss a bill which will be up before this House on suspension on Monday. This is the first time we learned it is to be brought up under suspension of the rules. This is an important bill and I want to express my views for the RECORD at this time.

The bill is H.R. 9069, which was introduced by the able gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SELDEN]. I am glad to see my friend is here on the floor and, of course, I will be glad to yield to him in due course or at any time he wishes me to yield for questions or for comment. I have a great deal of respect for the gentleman's integrity and ability, as I do for the integrity and ability of the entire Committee on Foreign Affairs. I must add, however, the committee voted this bill out 25 to 1, with only the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEYER] voting against it.

I believe it is a dangerous and unnecessary bill. I think this can be demonstrated in a very simple manner. I think it surrenders essential prerogatives of the Members of Congress to travel to any country in the world, and to get facts that Members of Congress need in the pursuit of their duties. I think it is probably unconstitutional but I do not want us to have to wait to see whether it is unconstitutional and cause the litigants much loss of money and to cause us as a Nation in a time of peril the loss of facts that we need in making decisions on matters of foreign policy.

I want to say before I go into the bill itself, I am not taking this position because of a lawsuit I have in the District Court of the District of Columbia which would probably become moot if this became law. I have every reason to believe that the other body would not act on this bill even if it were passed on Monday. My suit which is to require the Secretary of State to allow me to travel in China will, I hope, be decided before next year. I will say that I do not think it is important that I personally go to China. I think it is important though that Mr. SELDEN's committee, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the other body and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of both bodies—I think it is important that these properly constituted committees be allowed to go any place in the world and that it not be up to the Executive to decide where they can go in the world.

That is what this bill does. This bill ties Congress hands so far as gathering facts necessary for important decisions is concerned. I hope this will become clear in the short time we have between now and the time this House is asked to vote on it on Monday.

Mr. Speaker, we Americans are not afraid of ideas or facts. We tolerate unpopular opinions, we glory in argument. We think freedom is essential to our happiness and essential to our integrity and strength as a nation. We know that before decisions are made points have to be developed and facts ascertained. We do not endure censorship except in times of emergency and then only with the protection of due process of law.

What I should like to ask the House Foreign Affairs Committee is, What is the emergency which requires passport restrictions such as proposed in H.R. 9069 which was reported out of the Foreign Affairs Committee yesterday? If we have been harmed by Chinese Communists or Communist supporters who travel abroad I have yet to see the evidence. On the other hand, I am sure that such restrictions as proposed in this bill would do us a great deal of harm.

As for the area restrictions provided in this bill, here is a complete surrender to the Executive, a surrender which includes a ban on travel by Members of Congress to any area where the administration may not want them.

Remember, under this bill the Executive is given complete discretion to decide on exceptions, including which Members of Congress can go to these areas, and they do not have to state the reasons for making the exceptions.

Did you ever see a more complete, abject surrender to the Executive by this Congress of one of its most important prerogatives and purposes, namely to get the facts necessary for the wisest decisions of the important issues before us?

Certainly this is wrong. Congress should not restrict itself, so the Executive can do this to the legislative. And the Executive is doing it now. That is what my lawsuit is about. It will be decided in the U.S. Supreme Court before long. In the meantime I think that Congress should not tie its own hands.

This reminds me of an incident under the leader exchange program. A labor leader, so I was informed, was sent here from Venezuela. He was a Communist and his invitation was a mistake, of course. But when he got back to Venezuela he found that he could not speak about the United States with the same vehemence, the same vitriol, as he did before. Travel had broadened him.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that our country has no need to fear comparison. We have no need to worry about ideas and facts. Our traditions are great enough, our ideas are great enough to stand up. We do not need to fear what our citizens will find in other countries. We do need to fear when we start to restrict access to these facts.

Let us look at the bill. Section 5 makes the point that American passports allow Communists and their supporters to act as couriers and agents. We have ample laws against espionage, and we certainly know that diplomatic pouches can take care of most courier matters quite easily.

It states that for such persons to travel is harmful to the security of the United States. I suppose a good many editorials and a good many upstanding newspapers could be said to be harmful to the policies of the United States. They disagree, just as many speeches on this floor, as I said, are clearly in disagreement, clearly in criticism of actions and policies.

Our security in this country is not so frail that we have to invoke this kind of censorship. What is the nature of the emergency that we now must impose this kind of censorship? I hope this will be shown before this House; and I would be glad to stop at this point to yield to any member of the committee—and I see members from both sides of the aisle here—who will tell me what the emergency is that requires this censorship.

Let us consider section 6:

> The Secretary of State is authorized to deny a passport to, or revoke the passport of any person who is, or has been since January 1, 1951, a member of, or affiliated with, the Communist Party, or knowingly engages or has knowingly engaged since January 1, 1951 in activities intended to further the international Communist movement.

In other words, anybody who has been a Communist since January 1, 1951, cannot get a passport if the Secretary thinks it would harm our security. That is a pretty clear standard. For myself, in my opinion, if Communists manage to stay out of the law's reach in other ways, and if they want a passport to go abroad, I would like to see them get more education. It is especially necessary for them to get more education. If they do anything against our country that is a crime we have an excellent Federal Bureau of Investigation. We will hold them accountable for what they do.

As far as their right to travel is concerned, why should we restrict them? But aside from the merits, membership or affiliation is a fairly clear standard. I do not know what "affiliated" means. That is a little vague.

Let us go to the next one. This is one that is terribly vague and uncertain and which would surely lead to a great deal of trouble in the matter of interpretation. I think this would surely be called unconstitutional as much too vague a basis for denying or revoking a passport.

This is the provision I want to talk about now. You are a member of the Communist Party since 1951, "or knowingly engage or have knowingly engaged since January 1, 1951, in activities intended to further the international Communist movement." If so, your passport can be revoked if the Secretary thinks you are a security risk.

"Intended to further." Who says they are intended to further? Whose intentions? How do you prove these intentions except by inferences?

Let us look at the rest of the bill and go back to this:

> The Secretary of State shall not deny a passport to any person solely—

And get the word "solely"— > on the basis of membership in any organization, association, individual, or group adherence to unpopular views or criticisms of the United States or its domestic or foreign policy.

In other words, the Secretary of State cannot deny a passport solely on these grounds, for instance if you have "unpopular views." I wonder, Mr. Speaker, who among us do not hold a few unpopular views, and do we not glory in the fact we allow people to hold unpopular views in this country? And sometimes unpopular views become popular views.

Also, Mr. Speaker, I ask you, do we want to put into the law guilt by association? It says it cannot be the sole base, but it implies very plainly that it can be a basis for denying a passport to a person who wants to travel overseas. Continuing—> or criticisms of the United States or its domestic or foreign policies.

Every legislative day we have criticisms of domestic or foreign policies of the United States on this floor and throughout the land, and we glory in this right, we glory in these criticisms, and we should have these criticisms.

Let us see. A person is guilty of the terrible thing of criticizing our domestic or foreign policies or let us say holds unpopular views, or he belongs to an organization—it does not say what organization, it says "not solely on the basis of any organization or association with any individual or group."

These things cannot be the sole basis. You have to turn back. Let us see, this man is not a Communist or affiliated with the Communists. That is, you can use that provision that he has unpopular views, that he has joined the wrong organization or he has criticized the United States or some of our policies. It can be called that, and it is simple. It does not require much effort. Consider the words: "Any of those activities intended to further the international Communist movement."

I submit to you many things that are done today in the United States are very quickly called pro-Communist by people who disagree with what is being done. They say, "I do not think you are a Communist, but what you are doing is helping the Communists." This may or may not be true, but it is true that this is a matter of opinion.

But that is the standard that is set up here to be taken into court. Let us talk about that a little. There is due process of law in these passport proceedings because the Supreme Court says there has to be due process of law. There is a case on that which says the right to travel cannot be taken away without due process of law. I think that this bill violates due process by setting up a standard so vague and so indeterminate that it could be applied at the discretion or lack of discretion by the Executive.

Let us look at the usual case. The person who wants to go abroad would have to go to court. It costs money to go to court. He would have to take the case to the Supreme Court and it costs money to do that. Many people would not even try. They would say, "I hold unpopular views, I have criticized the Government. I don't want publicity as a possible security risk." It puts too much power in the hands of the Executive and it does not give us any standards. No; it is not a good law, it is not a good provision, it is a dangerous provision, it is an unnecessary provision.

Let us go on with the bill. The bill itself provides for due process that costs money to invoke.

Now let us look at title II, "Geographic limitations—Penalties."

This is the same section of the bill that exists in Senator FULBRIGHT's bill, another man for whom I hold the highest respect. It says:

> The President shall have the power by appropriate annual declaration, pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, to restrain the travel of all citizens and to limit the validity of all passports with respect to travel in the following places.

He gives three occasions for the exercise of this power:

1. Countries with which the United States is at war.

No objection to that. That is unnecessary, however. Who is going to go to a country with whom we are at war without violating other laws of this country? So, that is unnecessary.

2. Countries or areas where armed hostilities are in progress.

Armed hostilities are in progress in a great many countries today, where, I submit Members of Congress, journalists, and other people ought to be allowed to travel freely to get the facts we need about those countries. Let us say the Dominican Republic. There are armed hostilities going on there from time to time. Let us say Cuba. There have been armed hostilities there. There have been hostilities recently in India. There are hostilities going on in many countries of the world today. We need to know about those, and we do not want to have to rely, as this bill would require, on the President of the United States to decide, in complete, unbridled discretion, as to who gets to go. I have great respect for the Office of the President of the United States. I have great respect for the present incumbent. However, we have disagreements in this country on foreign policy, and we should be allowed to gather facts so that we can make the right decision. Let us look at this for a moment and come back to that point. What is the third reason?

3. Countries or areas to which the President finds that travel must be restricted in the national interest either because the U.S. Government is unable to provide adequate protection to citizens traveling therein—

Let us pause there for a moment. Where in the world can we give adequate protection to any traveling U.S. citizen? Certainly we cannot do it in any police state. And, we have difficulty doing it even in friendly democratic states. What kind of a standard is this "adequate police protection"? However, this provision means nothing, because the next provision in this law, in its wisdom, gives complete discretion to the President. He does not need this first provision. Listen to this—or because such travel would seriously impair the foreign relations of the United States.

That gives the President of the United States complete discretion. He is the man who decides about the foreign relations of the United States. What he says could not be challenged. He has to set it out. The next provision is a good provision. This determination by the President has to be made annually, and he has to set out the reasons why he puts these areas off limits, and then it has to be stamped on the passport, too. All right. That is good. I am glad it is there. It is a better bill with it. But, it is still a very bad bill, because what this Congress would do, if it passes this bill, and what the Foreign Affairs Committee has proposed, is that we give the President of the United States the power, unlimited power, to say what areas of the world shall be off limits to all the people of the United States. And, we do not ask him to make any particular findings. He is accountable to no one. He can pursue his own foreign policy without criticism based on firsthand facts. His policies may or may not be correct in every instance. They may be able to be improved in many instances if this Congress, both by direct travel—that is, travel of its own Members—and through the eyes of journalists or writers or ordinary citizens, for example, businessmen, who might go abroad and bring back information about what is going on in various places in the world. But, no, this bill would cut that off and it would give the power to the President to decide completely on his own whether or not a particular area should be made off limits. There would be no control on it at all by the Congress.

But, this is not all. You go further in this bill, and you can see he can make exceptions. In other words, he can decide that he wants to let some businessmen, some journalists, some Members of Congress go to this area, anyone, in his complete, uncontrolled discretion. He can decide to let anyone go to one of these areas, and he does not have to explain. Let me read the paragraph, part (c) of section 201:

In the national interest the President, without stating his reasons, may make exceptions to any such general geographical restraint for particular individuals or categories of persons.

Now, I am sure that the President would act in good faith. I am sure he would act for what he thought was in the national interest, but as every Member of this House knows, we often disagree about what the national interest is. The way to help resolve our disagreements is through gathering and evaluating the facts. What this bill does is cut off an important means of gathering facts we need for decisions, and that is the bill that is going to be brought up under suspension on Monday. That is the bill that this House is going to be asked to agree to. That is the bill that is going to reduce the prerogatives and, indeed, the duties of Members of Congress to gather facts that they need in the pursuit of their duties in making these important decisions about foreign affairs. I say it is a dangerous bill, an unnecessary bill. It is a blank check for the President. I believe that it would be eventually called unconstitutional because of the vagueness and uncertainty of the provisions.

I have here, and I am going to include at the conclusion of my remarks, by unanimous consent, a comparison of passport bills before the Senate. I think that it is something which Members will be interested in. It shows the various provisions of those bills. I am also including remarks that I made before the Government Operations Subcommittee on passport legislation of the other body, a statement that I made on September 1, 1959, and two editorials, one from the Oregon Journal for August 29 and one from the Oregonian for August 29 concerning my suit against the Secretary of State.

In conclusion, and before I yield for questions or remarks that members of the committee may want to make—and I hope they will want to make them here, because we do have a little more time here than we will have on Monday—I want to say that I think we should have legislation in this field. I think the matter ought to be under the control of Congress and not left at large.

I think that the provisions in Mr. FULBRIGHT's bill regarding the conditions when a passport can be refused make sense largely. I do have some doubts about one of his provisions in this respect, but I think we should take over and legislate in this field and provide for due process as the Supreme Court has said is required. But I do not think we should enact any legislation which would set up such a vague and indeterminate standard for the granting or refusal of passports. I do not think we should be a party to tying the hands of Congress and its committees and its Members who want to travel and who should travel throughout the world, to see for themselves as best they can the facts which should underlie any sensible, effective foreign policy.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman, my good friend who is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and who is the author of the bill I have been denouncing.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentleman from Oregon. I want to say to him that certainly we agree on one point and that is that Congress should legislate in this field. In order to set the record straight, I should point out that the bill the gentleman has just been discussing—H.R. 9069—does authorize the Secretary of State to deny passports to or revoke passports of persons knowingly engaged in activities intended to further the international Communist movement. Such denial or revocation is made contingent upon a finding by the Secretary of State that the activities or presence abroad of such persons would be harmful to the security of the United States, and any denial or revocation of a passport under this authority is made subject to judicial review.

Up until June 16 of last year the Secretary of State had been, under existing regulations, denying passports. On the 16th of June the Supreme Court in two cases, Kent against Dulles and Dayton against Dulles, ruled that the regulations of the Secretary of State denying passports to supporters of the world Communist movement were invalid because of a lack of specific legislative authority. Let me point out that the Supreme Court raised no constitutional issue with respect to the denial of passports. The Court held that the Secretary of State did not have legislative authority to deny passports.

On July 7, 1958, the President requested Congress to enact legislation granting authority necessary to deal with this matter and emphasized the urgency of the problem.

After receiving the President's message, the Committee on Foreign Affairs during the 85th Congress held hearings on passport legislation and reported a bill. This bill was considered in this body last year on the last day of the session and passed without a dissenting vote. It was not considered by the Senate before adjournment. That same bill was introduced by me on the first day of the present session of Congress. We have had extensive hearings this year, and I should add at this point that some 20 other bills have been introduced dealing with the issuance of passports. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, for more than a week, has worked on marking this bill up. The bill reported—H.R. 9069—in the judgment of the committee, not only will grant to the Secretary of State the necessary authority to deny passports to persons knowingly engaged in activities intended to further the international Communist movement, provided it is determined their presence abroad will be harmful to the security of the United States, but it gives to the persons involved both administrative and judicial review.

In my opinion, this measure is cloaked with safeguards I am certain the gentleman from Oregon would want in it.

Although I shall attempt to go into this matter more thoroughly on Monday when the bill comes up for consideration, I have imposed on the time of the gentleman from Oregon in order to make a brief explanation of this legislation so that it might be better understood by the Members of the House.

Mr. PORTER. I thank the gentleman. I know that the committee has worked hard and very carefully on this important subject, but I still insist that the standard set up in section 6, "knowingly engages or has knowingly engaged, since January 1, 1951, in activities intended to further the international Communist movement"—and I will go on and read, as the gentleman correctly referred, to the next sentence: "as to whom it is determined that his or her activities or presence abroad would under the findings made in section 5"—which is the general section right ahead of this—"be harmful to the security of the United States."

Certainly, what is harmful to the security of the United States under section 5 is equally vague and equally uncertain, and would again just emphasize the point I made that this would mean complete discretion in the executive.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield.

Mr. SELDEN. Let me point out that under the terms of this legislation, as I understand it, the evidence that is brought in during administrative review of the case is subject to judicial review. If the evidence is not sufficient to satisfy the courts then, in my opinion, the passport must be issued.

Mr. PORTER. Yes, but I want to say this first about the judicial review. It is my opinion, as I have already stated, that the yardstick provided in this legislation is insufficient from a constitutional point of view in that it is too vague and uncertain. Therefore, I believe it will be declared unconstitutional because the yardstick is to vague and so uncertain. The words "intended to further the international Communist movement"—that can be said about many things and it is said about many things every day which have no connection with the disloyalty of any person to the United States. As far as "the security of the United States" is concerned, that is another vague and uncertain phrase which would be applied according to whatever policies the executive had at that time, which policies would no doubt be in good faith, but which may be very mistaken and confused and which may need criticism.

Mr. SELDEN. I am sure the gentleman will agree with me that any question as to the constitutionality of this bill ultimately will have to be decided by the courts. I have great respect for the wisdom of my friend, both as a legislator and as an attorney. However, if he can fathom the minds of the present occupants of the Supreme Court, then he can qualify also as a psychiatrist.

Mr. PORTER. There is another statement that I want to ask my friend about. This is the sentence on page 3, at the top.

> The Secretary of State shall not deny a passport to any person solely on the basis of membership in any organization, association with any individual or group, adherence to unpopular views, or criticisms of the United States or its domestic or foreign policies.

Does the gentleman understand that as I do, that although these things could not be the only basis for denying a passport, they could be considered by the Secretary of State in denying a passport.

Mr. SELDEN. Membership in the Communist Party—yes.

Mr. PORTER. No, no; I am talking about these things on page 3.

Mr. SELDEN. You must tie the first sentence on page 3 in with the whole context of section 6.

Mr. PORTER. Yes; but the question is: Can he consider adherence to unpopular views for example, in connection with the provisions in the first part of the section having to do with either membership since January 1, 1951, or knowingly engaging since January 1951, in activities intended to further the international Communist movement.

Mr. SELDEN. I would think, yes, but it would also have to be tied in with the requirement "as to whom it is determined that his or her activities or presence abroad would be harmful, under the findings made in section 5, to the security of the United States."

Mr. PORTER. Fine.

Mr. SELDEN. I think we should make the record clear, and I would like to read the findings set forth in section 5, if the gentleman will allow me to do so.

Mr. PORTER. I will be glad to have the gentleman read it.

Mr. SELDEN. It reads as follows:

> SEC. 5. The Congress finds that the international Communist movement of which the Communist Party of the United States of America is an integral part, seeks everywhere to thwart United States policy, to influence foreign governments and peoples against the United States, and by every means, including force and violence, to weaken the United States and ultimately to bring it under Communist domination.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. PORTER. I yield.

Mr. FASCELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Oregon insofar as the gentleman from Alabama has read the findings which are carried in section 5 of this legislation, does the gentleman from Oregon agree or disagree?

Mr. PORTER. Of course, this is the kind of flag waving that will convince Members of the House who do not have the opportunity——

Mr. FASCELL. I am asking the gentleman whether he agrees or disagrees.

Mr. PORTER. Wait just a moment, please.

Mr. Speaker, I do not yield further. As I was saying, this is the kind of flag waving that will convince a good many Members of this House who do not have an opportunity to go into this legislation that they have to be alined with it.

Of course we agree with this. This is true. Now go ahead with the reading, unless the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] has something further to complete this thought.

Mr. SELDEN. Section 5 continues as follows:

> That the activities of the international Communist movement constitute a clear, present, and continuing danger to the security of the United States; that travel by couriers and agents is a major and essential means by which the international Communist movement is promoted and directed; that a United States passport requests other countries not only to permit the holder to pass freely and safely, but also to give all lawful aid and protection to the holder, and thereby facilitates the travel of such holder to and in foreign countries; and that in view of the history of the use of United States passports by supporters of the international Communist movement to further the purposes of that movement, the issuance of passports to any person described in section 6 is harmful to the security of the United States and therefore passports should be denied to such persons.

Does the gentleman agree with the remaining portion of section 5 that I have just read?

Mr. PORTER. If I may comment on that, certainly I agree down to the end of line 4, ending with the words "United States."

I do not know whether travel by couriers and agents is a major and essential means by which the international Communist movement is promoted and directed. I suppose it does play an important part. Whether it is a major and essential part over and above what they send in diplomatic pouches I have no way of knowing.

Mr. SELDEN. The House Committee on Foreign Affairs has gone into this subject very thoroughly, and this bill was approved with only one dissenting vote.

Mr. PORTER. I am aware of that.

Mr. SELDEN. This legislation has been a matter of study for a period of more than 12 months. I am sorry also that it has come up this late in the session. I personally would have preferred that it be considered under a rule, but we could not get a rule. The only way it can be considered is under suspension.

Had I known the gentleman was going to have this special order today I would have attempted to have had more detailed information to give to him in connection with the bill, but I can assure the gentleman that on Monday I will go into the question that he has raised, more thoroughly.

Mr. PORTER. May I say that had I known this bill was coming up under suspension of the rules on Monday some of my ammunition would have been of somewhat higher caliber also.

With some of this I might agree. I do not think it can be demonstrated that all of it is true.

That a United States passport requests other countries not only to permit the holder to pass freely and safely—

That is all right; we agree to that—but also to give all lawful aid and protection to the holder, and thereby facilitates the travel of such holder.

Even if it has helped, the question is, does it do more harm to us than good to allow freedom of travel by our citizens, even citizens who do not agree with us and people who have opposing unpopular views? What have we got to fear from time in the marketplace of ideas?

It seems to me that these people in their travels, if they are engaged in espionage, one already covered by penal law; we do not have to worry about that. But as far as restricting the rights of people to travel and giving unbridled discretion to the Executive, and having it include even Members of Congress, is quite a different matter.

Does the gentleman understand this as meaning that Members of Congress would be subject to this law? I will point out to the gentleman that one Member on your side said he did not think it would apply. So with all your thorough discussion it was not unanimous. Would the gentleman care to reply to that question?

Mr. SELDEN. In my opinion, a Member of Congress would be subject to this law.

Mr. PORTER. Let us see. Suppose the gentleman from Alabama who is the distinguished chairman of Inter-American Subcommittee of the Foreign Affairs Committee decides that he and his committee wants to visit Latin America next year and he wants to take the committee, including the gentleman from Florida, and let us say that the President decides that things are pretty rough down there, that the gentleman does not agree with his policies and he is not going to have him go down there, so he puts the whole area or part of it off limits under this bill as he could do. In short, because of this legislation he can say that this committee of this House, which is charged with getting such information and with drawing up legislation in this field, cannot go. Would you like that, Mr. Chairman of the Inter-American Subcommittee?

Mr. SELDEN. I may say to the gentleman I have enough confidence in the President of the United States, whoever he may be—Democrat or Republican—to believe that he would not place an entire area of the world off limits to everyone in order to prevent a congressional committee from performing its constitutional duties.

Mr. PORTER. If it did happen and there was such disagreement, as there frequently is, of this nature, and I think we should have it because we get better policies out of disagreements, would not the gentleman feel he was not able to do the job that the House had put upon his shoulders?

Mr. SELDEN. Let me reemphasize to the gentleman from Oregon that, in my opinion, no President of the United States would use the regulations set forth in this bill except in the best interests of this Nation.

I might point out to the gentleman that the President under present law, as indicated by the passport suit the gentleman has filed, has authority along this line. Title II of this bill, in my opinion, limits the authority of the President to set geographical limitations on the use of passports. Title II requires the President to annually declare and publish determinations as far as geographic limitations are concerned and to state specifically and in detail the reason for the necessity of such action.

Mr. PORTER. I want to say to the gentleman that the President has to set it forth but nobody can question it. It is entirely in his discretion. He has to tell you why he says it and we can argue about it here, but under this bill he has complete power and we have none except to enact legislation to repeal or revise the law.

Mr. SELDEN. What does he do now?

Mr. PORTER. What he does now is being subjected to a court test.

Mr. SELDEN. This legislation will be subject to a court test also.

Mr. PORTER. Apparently the President's authority is much in doubt by the President himself, or he would not be asking for the legislation from the committee in the first place, knowing it is being questioned in the courts as it has been.

Mr. SELDEN. The courts did not question the President's authority on constitutional grounds. It is questioned because of a lack of specific legislative authority. In other words, it has dropped the matter back into the hands of the Congress, and the Congress is now legislating on it.

Mr. PORTER. Whether the President has power under existing law to do this is sub judice. Let us go on with the problem before us. Should we abandon our rights as a separate branch of the Government, one of these rights being to get facts underlying the decisions we make? Apparently the gentleman is willing to say to any President, "I am willing to give up my prerogative as a Member of the separate branch. I know you are going to act in good faith and wisely."

I believe he will act in good faith. But will he act wisely? It is a question of wisdom, what is the national welfare. They are the things we discuss in these halls. If we give up this prerogative of Congress, and the gentleman is willing to do that, I hope the Supreme Court will say we cannot do it any more than we can give up the coining of money and the declaring of war and other powers which are given to us by the Constitution. Our power to legislate includes the power to get facts, and the power to get facts certainly includes the power of any committee of this House or any Congressman to go any place in the world so that he can see for himself as best he can what is going on, then come back and do what the Constitution asks him to do and what his constituents expect him to do.

Mr. SELDEN. I think the gentleman is overly concerned about this legislation. The Congress is acting under its authority in passing this legislation, if it should do so, and we have the same authority to repeal it in the event it is abused. I am willing to take that chance in the present cold war we presently are waging with the forces of international communism and in view of the dangers that it presents.

Mr. PORTER. I have every faith in the gentleman's ability and good intentions. But we do not want to rob ourselves of the ability to get firsthand facts for ourselves and just docilely let the President tell us where to go.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FASCELL. I do not quite have the concern that the gentleman has with respect to the fact Congress is hurting itself in passing this legislation, or making it impossible for them to get information which is needed to carry on its legislative duties.

Mr. PORTER. But the gentleman is willing that be done.

Mr. FASCELL. I am willing that it should be done, because it occurs to me one of the material considerations in the President's refusal to allow a Congressman to go any place in the world would depend on whether that Congressman goes as an individual at his own expense or whether he goes on congressional business at the expense of a committee for governmental purposes. I think there is a great deal of difference. If the President saw fit to abuse his discretion in that regard, I think it would have immediate repercussions in the Congress. But, I cannot conceive any circumstance where any President would deny the right of a committee of Congress to travel where it wanted.

Mr. PORTER. There is a distinction between my going to China or any——

Mr. FASCELL. As an individual citizen.

Mr. PORTER. Any single Member going to China or anyplace else. There is a distinction between that and Senator MAGNUSON'S Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce having an official subcommittee to go over there studying potentials and conditions of trade. There is a difference, but I do not think there is a legal difference.

Mr. FASCELL. I did not say there was a legal difference.

Mr. PORTER. I do not think there is a legal difference, because I think every Member of this House and every Member of the Senate has, so far as concerns every other Member, similar responsibilities under the Constitution to get the facts underlying his decision as he votes. So, I do not think that would make any difference in terms of the law, in terms of how we ought to consider this bill's proposed trespass on the prerogatives of the Congress. The gentleman is willing to have the Congress tie its hands and say to the President, as the gentleman from Alabama is: "Mr. President, we not only trust your good faith, but we also trust your wisdom as to whether or not our committees can travel." I cannot buy that. Preventing committees from doing their work is more important from the standpoint of Congress itself. We depend on our particular committees to do this business of gathering information and reporting out legislation, not individual Members. But legally that does not make any difference. It is much more important that committees be allowed to go rather than individual Members.

Mr. FASCELL. I have not made any particular distinction, I will say to the gentleman. I would make no distinction in law. And, I certainly would not support an amendment which would nullify this prohibition as to Members of Congress. I would remind the gentleman, we are first citizens of the United States and secondly Congressmen who represent our particular constituents and districts. I therefore would be perfectly willing to have the law apply with equal force to every single individual in this country.

Mr. PORTER. Of course, I recognize and agree with the gentleman that we are citizens like everybody else. It is my position that there should be freedom of travel for all American citizens, including Congressmen. However, if you are going to restrict travel, if you are going to restrict the travel of Congressmen, you are restricting the representatives of the people of the United States. We Members of Congress have the responsibility of enacting laws having to do with prosperity, freedom, and peace. Therefore, it becomes even more dangerous, this law, because it does apply to Members of the Congress. It does cut off our means of getting information we need and have a duty to gather as best we can.

Mr. FASCELL. That may or may not be true. I ascribe no greater degree of intelligence or inferiority to the Members of Congress than any other citizen. I say that we are quite representative of the American citizen, and therefore I do not have the same fears and dangers as the gentleman from Oregon does. But, let me ask this philosophical question: Would you do away with passports completely as a matter of policy? After all, the passport does little or nothing for the individual according to your view?

Mr. PORTER. If the gentleman will recall, in my earlier remarks I said I thought we should legislate in this field, and, of course, we should have passports as a means of identification, and I also believe in time of war, of course, we should not have people going to countries with which we are fighting. I also agree that a man who owes the United States for his passage home the last time he was abroad should not be allowed to go, or if he is under indictment he should not be allowed to go overseas. There is a provision in Senator FULBRIGHT'S bill having to do with somebody who wants to go abroad but might violate our security and hurt the United States, and that this can be shown in court, with the burden on the Government to show it. I think I would go along with a provision like that. Now, those provisions are different from this provision. The gentleman's position is that if a committee of Congress wants to go to China, for example, and if this Congress should disagree with the administration policies in this area, we should ask the President for permission, "Please, may we leave the room, Mr. President? May we go see what is going on in China?" And he says, "No, I know what is going on there, and it would not be good for the U.S. policy in the Far East."

Mr. FASCELL. Is that any different from the situation that presently exists?

Mr. PORTER. The situation at present has been challenged in court.

Mr. FASCELL. It has been challenged many times.

Mr. PORTER. And the administration has come to the Congress and asked for this very right to legalize what it has been doing illegally and unconstitutionally.

Mr. FASCELL. The gentleman knows very well that the request of the President was made before there was any particular challenge by the case of the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PORTER. That is of no significance. There was a challenge by Mr. Worthy and others about their ability to control passports.

Mr. FASCELL. The gentleman is aware that there has been legislation on the books for a long time giving the President this authority, in general terms.

Mr. PORTER. I come back to the essential point in my remarks, that every American, with very few exceptions as noted, ought to be allowed to travel freely throughout the world and that this is especially important for Members of the Congress who, under the Constitution, have the power and the responsibility of making laws in this country for keeping us at peace, for helping our prosperity, and preserving our freedom.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman think that just because we are fortunate enough to be elected to the Congress, that we are superior to anybody in the United States?

Mr. PORTER. Of course not. What I meant to make clear to this House, I say to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, the majority leader, was that we have a special responsibility under the Constitution. That is why we are given an office; that is why we are given a staff; that is what we are here for. It is important that we get the facts, and we should not tie our hands along these lines especially at the whim of the President, who represents another coequal branch of the Government.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. Of course.

Mr. McCORMACK. The Constitution does not give us any special privileges.

Mr. PORTER. I agree with my friend and I would not ask for any special privileges.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman refers to a staff. The Constitution does not provide that. That is provided by the House, by the Congress, in order that we might more effectively and efficiently perform our duties for the people. As to the offices, the Constitution says nothing about building these office buildings. We do so so that the Members may have offices in order more efficiently to perform their duties.

Mr. PORTER. I agree with the gentleman and I thank him. Of course, these are not privileges that we get because we are above ordinary mortals. But let me say this to the gentleman: the Library of Congress has its Legislative Reference Service as a help to us in doing our work. If the President were to be given the power to say that we could not take certain books out of that library, that would be analogous to what is being proposed here, because the right to a Congressman to travel is the right to get firsthand information, such information being frequently much better than any which is available in books. The gentleman certainly would not allow the President of the United States to censor these books. We should not allow him to censor our right and our duty to travel throughout the world and seek information so we may be better Congressmen.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, here is the situation. The Congress of the United States passes a law. I may not agree with the law. The gentleman has the perfect right to oppose. I recognize that right. It is one of our great heritages. We have freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of religious conscience, the sanctity of the home. There are some laws on the statute books, some provisions of which I may not agree with, but as long as they are there and as long as this is a government of laws and not of men, I am supposed to obey them until they are amended or repealed.

I do not know whether I am in complete agreement with the laws on the statute books with relation to passports, but as long as they are there, this being a government of laws, I am supposed to obey them.

Does the gentleman agree with that?

Mr. PORTER. Of course; and I say to my distinguished friend, the majority leader, with whom I usually agree, that that is why I filed my lawsuit, rather than violating the law.

Mr. McCORMACK. Let me say to the gentleman that he has the right under our Constitution to bring a suit and without regard to what the outcome of the suit may be, that is immaterial; the gentleman has the right to bring the suit and I would fight to preserve his right to do so.

Mr. PORTER. Let me say that since I have been conscious of the fact that a House of Representatives exists, I have known the name of JOHN MCCORMACK and I have associated it with liberalism.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman make that progressivism?

Mr. PORTER. Progressivism.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. PORTER. I have associated it with things that are good and that I admire, call it liberalism, progressivism, or what you will. I know my friend from Massachusetts believes that unpopular views in this country are necessary and proper. I should hope that my friend from Massachusetts would not want adherence to uppopular views as provided in this bill to be used as a part of the reason for denying a passport to a citizen of the United States. And that is what this bill provides, that such unpopular views or criticism of the United States in its domestic or foreign policies may be used to deny permission to travel abroad.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SELDEN. The gentleman did not go far enough. That can be used as one factor in making the determination—but it must be coupled with the other provisions of section 6 of H.R. 9069.

Mr. PORTER. I thought I made that absolutely clear. It must be coupled with this vague and uncertain standard which says activities intended to further the international Communist movement which the Government thinks will be harmful to the security of the United States. I say that is too vague and uncertain as a basis for criminal action and the denial of a passport.

Mr. SELDEN. The gentleman admits that is only a part of the consideration?

Mr. PORTER. That is exactly what I said, that would be a part of the reason for denying a passport.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield.

Mr. FASCELL. I would respectfully submit to the gentleman that that is a strained construction which would not be supported by the courts. I doubt that the gentleman can find a case which would say that the affirmative language in the paragraph read by the gentleman could by inversion make an affirmative finding of law.

Mr. PORTER. If the gentleman will be patient, I will go through this again. I assume the gentleman has a copy of the bill. Let us not strain at all, let us look at it and see what is written down. I am referring to section 6.

Mr. FASCELL. Let us read the last paragraph, the one to which the gentleman had reference.

Mr. PORTER. Let us read the whole section.

Mr. FASCELL. Very well, read it.

Mr. PORTER. Page 2, section 6:

> The Secretary of State is authorized to deny a passport to, or revoke the passport of, any person who is, or has been since January 1, 1951, a member of, or affiliated with, the Communist Party—

That is a clear standard because I suppose you can find out whether he is a member or has been affiliated, although I do not know exactly what affiliated means in this connection.

Mr. FASCELL. The gentleman does not agree with that so far?

Mr. PORTER. I do not agree with it. We have law against Communists and their activities and I think they should be enforced. But I think allowing a Communist to travel overseas cannot hurt us on the balance and may sometimes help him get facts that he may need to change his ways.

Mr. FASCELL. Even though his activities would be intended to further the Communist movement and even though his activities would be contrary to the security of the United States as determined by the President?

Mr. PORTER. So far as they may be so determined and are subject to laws of the United States, those laws should be enforced.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. PORTER. I yield.

Mr. FASCELL. Overt acts against our Government are now punishable by law——

Mr. PORTER. I think the law is a little more explicit than that.

Mr. FASCELL. Does the gentleman oppose additional restriction or limitations on persons commiting such acts?

Mr. PORTER. Of course, not. We have many restrictions on ememies of the United States, whether they be Communists or something else.

Mr. FASCELL. Then this is an additional restriction to which in principle the gentleman is really not opposed.

Mr. PORTER. Let us get back to this amendment. The gentleman said he wanted to see it demonstrated without any strain. Let us demonstrate it. We have already said "whether a person is a member of the Communist Party." Now we go on—" or knowingly engages or has knowingly engaged since January 1, 1951, in activities intended—" intended by whom by the way?—and in whose conception?—"intended to further the international Communist movement as to whom it is determined that his or her activities or presence abroad would under the findings made in section 5 be harmful to the security of the United States."

All right, we have two grounds—either a Communist Party member or engaging in these activities intended—and so on—and then I will go on to the sentence which I read, and which I deplore. Let us get the evidence before us.

Mr. FASCELL. Wait a minute.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield.

Mr. FASCELL. What meaning do you place on the "as to whom" clause.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield.

Mr. Speaker, I want to continue this because the gentleman wanted to get this without any strain here, and I want to see that he does not get it.

The bill reads further:

> The Secretary of State shall not deny a passport to any person solely on the basis of membership in any organization, association with any individual or group, adherence to unpopular views, or criticisms of the United States or its domestic or foreign policies.

Let me say I am sure the committee put this in with the thought that it was making us a more liberal section. But, I say the effect of this, and the plain effect of this, is when it says that he will not do this "solely", it means he can use unpopular views as part of the bases for the denial or revocation of a passport. That is not straining at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. FASCELL. The gentleman will admit that he just modified the language in the construction of the sentence by saying, "But, I say the effect of this,—"

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make that 10 minutes because I think these things need to be discussed. This is something every Member is very much interested in.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the unanimous consent request that the gentleman from Oregon proceed for 10 additional minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida to complete his statement.

Mr. FASCELL. I thank the gentleman.

We had two points. Reading section 6, as you read it, I would like to go back to the first part of it so that we can clarify our thinking on it. I think it is important to determine whether we agree on the construction of the language. The bill speaks of the denial by the Secretary of State of a passport to a person who has since January 1, 1951, been a member of or affiliated with the Communist party or he knowingly engages or has knowingly engaged in activities intended to further—and so on. There is a clause subsequent to that, immediately following, which clause relates to all the prior language. Does the gentleman agree the clause which reads "as to whom it is determined" relates to the prior language?

Mr. PORTER. I not only agree to that, but I pointed that out to the gentleman a moment ago.

Mr. FASCELL. I am glad that we are in agreement.

Mr. PORTER. But I say this is still a vague and uncertain standard which no court could apply with any semblance of certainty.

Mr. FASCELL. The gentleman is entitled to his opinion.

Mr. PORTER. Thank you.

Mr. FASCELL. I would respectfully submit that there is no difficulty interpreting what "security of the United States" means. I submit that with regard to the last paragraph of that section the gentleman has given an interpretation which does not, I respectfully submit, appear in the law.

Mr. PORTER. Will the gentleman demonstrate that the phrase "shall not deny a passport solely on the basis of membership" means that you can use unpopular views or criticism of the United States as part of the determination that it is harmful to the security of the United States or that it was intended to further the interests of international communism?

Mr. FASCELL. The gentleman is placing a forced construction on that language. The language says "solely"; it does not say he may use part of it, a material part of it, a substantial part of it; it does not say anything about that whatsoever.

Mr. PORTER. It does. It says that you cannot do it solely on that basis in determining whether it was done to help the Communist movement, but that you can use it in connection with the finding by the Secretary of State.

Mr. FASCELL. That is not what it says, you must relate it to the basic grounds for denial explicitly set forth in the first paragraph of section 6.

Mr. PORTER. That is exactly what it says. I would like to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota for whose views I have great respect but with whose views I find myself frequently in disagreement.

Mr. JUDD. Let us look again at the language of section 6 to note the two findings, not one, that the Secretary of State must make before he can deny a passport. First the person must, since January 1, 1951, have been a member of or affiliated with the Communist Party; or, two, he must be knowingly engaging in or have knowingly engaged in activities intended to further the international Communist movement.

Mr. PORTER. They are alternative.

Mr. JUDD. They are all one; that is one condition.

Mr. PORTER. No; the word "or" is a disjunctive, not a conjunctive.

Mr. JUDD. It is a person who is found to be in one or the other, or both, of these two categories. That is the first requirement; but there is also another condition. Let me read from our report, for it sets it out accurately, I think:

> The bill provides for the denial or revocation of a passport of any person as to whom two findings are made—

Two determinations. The gentleman asked who makes them; the Secretary of State makes them. There is no question about that. But he does not have the final say, as I shall point out. Then the report goes on:

> First, the Secretary of State must find that the person either is or has been since January 1, 1951, a member of, or affiliated with, the Communist Party, or knowingly engages or has knowingly engaged, since January 1, 1951, in activities intended to further the international Communist movement.

That is the first determination. If the person cannot be proved to be or to have been an actual member or affiliate of the Communist Party, the Secretary of State has to make a finding that he has engaged in activities intended to further the international Communist movement. He has to show intent; and it is a mightly hard job to do that, to make a case that will stand up in court that a person's activities were intended to further the international Communist movement. Would the gentlemen have preferred that we delete the word "intended"—and have it read, "activities which furthered the international Communist conspiracy," whether so intended or not?

We have surrounded it with every possible safeguard. But now, to go ahead——

Mr. PORTER. Before we go further let us dwell on that, because I would like to respond to the gentleman's analysis. I think the gentleman's analysis does not go far enough. I think that there are these two things: He has to be a member or has to be engaged in these activities plus. It must be against the security of the United States. Then, going to the last paragraph.

Mr. JUDD. Let me comment there.

Mr. PORTER. In just a minute. It has to support the findings that this is harmful to the security of the United States and intended to help the Communist Party.

Mr. JUDD. That last sentence was not in the bill originally. It was put in by the Committee. Would the gentleman prefer not to have that sentence in the bill?

Mr. PORTER. I think I would, yes. I would be glad to have any part of it stricken out and eliminated.

Mr. JUDD. That does not answer my specific question. Would the gentleman feel more secure if that last sentence of section 6, the first five lines on page 3, were eliminated?

Mr. PORTER. No, considering its effect, I would rather have that language there. I am sure the committee meant it as a safeguard.

Mr. JUDD. A protection to the citizen.

Mr. PORTER. Yes; that mere association or unpopular views, or criticism of the Government of itself could not be used alone to say that a man is a security risk. What I object to is that it is made subject to the discretion of the Executive.

Mr. JUDD. Let us consider the first sentence of the section a little further. The Secretary must find first, that the person, since January 1, 1951, has been a member of or affiliated with the Communist Party or has knowingly engaged in activities intended to further the international Communist movement.

Second, the Secretary of State must determine also that the person's "activities or presence abroad would under the findings made in section 5 be harmful to the security of the United States." This is the crux of the matter. He cannot deny a passport on the basis only of what the person has been or is, or what he has done or is doing now here at home. He has to determine that to have him abroad would be harmful to our security. That is no easy thing to do.

The gentleman has said this gives the Secretary of State unbridled discretion to restrict travel, that he can act on a capricious basis or for political reasons or upon almost any whim that may motivate the Secretary of State. That simply is not true. In how many cases can the Secretary make such stringent findings? Even so, we provide that denial or revocation of a passport pursuant to section 6, which we have been discussing, "shall be subject to judicial review on the record in the District Courts of the United States." So we do not give final authority to the Secretary of State; we give final authority to the district courts of the United States.

Does the gentleman distrust the District Courts of the United States?

Mr. PORTER. No, I do not, but I say that takes a long time. I want to make a correction of what I said. I had Mr. SELDEN'S first bill which had the "who" in it. I see the "who" has been crossed out in the latest version which he gave me just prior to my taking the floor today. That has the effect of making it conjunctive rather than disjunctive. But that does not change the point because of this. A person who is a member of or affiliated with the Communist Party or knowingly engages or has knowingly engaged in activities still makes the point, and if they are doing things that the Secretary decides furthers it, if he finds this hurts the security of the United States, then he can decide to issue no passport or to revoke an existing passport.

Mr. JUDD. The key thing in the language is that the Secretary must make a determination that this person's activities or presence abroad would be, not just troublesome to the Secretary or to the administration in power, but harmful to the security of the United States. The applicant can have the district court review the action, whether or not he was a member of or affiliated with the Communist Party, whether or not he has knowingly engaged, or is knowingly engaged in activities intended to further international communism. Then the court will also have to rule on the determination that to have that person abroad would be harmful to the security of the United States. The section gives all possible protection against any innocent person's being denied a passport.

Mr. PORTER. It is too vague and indefinite. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SELDEN. Am I correct in assuming that the gentleman desires legislation in connection with this matter?

Mr. PORTER. Yes, I think there should be legislation.

Mr. SELDEN. Would the gentleman prefer the Fulbright bill which he mentioned earlier rather than the bill now before the House?

Mr. PORTER. The Fulbright bill is the best bill, but it has provisions in it which include section 2 with which I do not agree.

Mr. SELDEN. Am I correct in assuming that the two main objections that the gentleman has to this bill are lines 1 to 5 on page 3 and title II of the bill, beginning at page 4, line 8?

Mr. PORTER. No. As I told the gentleman from Minnesota, I would rather have 1 to 5 in, if you are going to have this bill.

Mr. SELDEN. The main argument that the gentleman has made this afternoon has been in connection with the sentence at the top of page 3 and also in connection with title II of the bill.

Mr. PORTER. It shows the kind of thing that can be used to deny or revoke a passport, for instance, unpopular views, or criticism of the United States.

Mr. SELDEN. Am I correct in stating that the gentleman has indicated he would prefer having the first sentence on page 3 in the bill rather than having it eliminated?

Mr. PORTER. Yes; if there is going to be a bill.

Mr. SELDEN. Am I correct in stating that title II of this bill is almost identical with title IV of the Fulbright bill which the gentleman has indicated he prefers rather than H.R. 9069?

Mr. PORTER. Yes; but minus that title, however.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to continue for 15 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PORTER. I feel I should yield to the gentleman from Vermont, but I yield to the chairman of the subcommittee at this time.

Mr. SELDEN. In connection with the gentleman's desire for legislation, did he introduce any passport measure so that the committee could have the benefit of his views in this connection?

Mr. PORTER. No. I am late in giving my views to the committee, but I hope the committee will consider them.

Mr. SELDEN. Does the gentleman realize the committee had open hearings on this matter and that Members of Congress were given an opportunity to testify?

Mr. PORTER. I say mea culpa.

Mr. SELDEN. I hope the gentleman will take into consideration that this will possibly be the only passport legislation considered this year. If he is in favor of legislation of this type, I trust he will give H.R. 9069 serious consideration when it is before the House next Monday.

Mr. PORTER. I do not see that there is any emergency that we have to bring it up under suspension of the rules. I see no reason for haste As one of the committee members said, he wanted this to come up under a rule, and I would like to see it come up under a rule.

Mr. SELDEN. I would prefer to have the bill considered under a rule so the gentleman could have all the time he desires to make his views known. We explored that angle but at this point in the session a rule cannot be obtained. I have not been remiss in attempting to secure consideration of H.R. 9069. As a matter of fact, I have been working on it since the first week of January. I personally feel that the emergency is such that we should consider H.R. 9069 now under suspension of the rules rather than delay its consideration until the next session of the Congress.

Mr. PORTER. I thank the gentleman for his participation, and again I pay tribute to his ability and integrity.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. MEYER. May I say that I believe most sincerely that my colleagues on the Committee on Foreign Affairs worked long and diligently to hammer in shape a bill that they thought was proper and would protect the rights of American citizens. However, I personally disagree with the type of legislation that came out, and I would like to point out a couple of these things. For instance, it has been said that we must have a Government of laws and not of men. I would say that it is my opinion that this legislation basically—and we must go by intent—has much in it that is the intent of the State Department as expressed by Mr. Hanes, its security officer; that they really want to have a Government of men rather than a Government of laws and that their objectives in getting this bill are not good. They want to control the activities of Americans without due process, and this is a matter of record in the hearings. It is a matter of record by what they said. It is a matter of record by what they are really driving at. And, I say most sincerely I believe that this bill is bad, not because our committee did not want to have a good bill, having done everything that they possibly could to have a good bill, but merely because the net result is going to be harmful to the protection of the rights of American citizens. I would like to have the gentleman comment on that point of intent as expressed by Mr. Hanes in his testimony that we know about, not only before our committee but before the Senate committee.

Mr. PORTER. I thank the gentleman. In commenting on the point he brings up, I will say that the best example of how the President has misused the power he pretends to have now, but in my opinion he does not have, and the courts will eventually so decide—is that he has authorized 40-odd newsmen to go to China, but when a Congressman requests the right to travel to China, he says, "No, it is not in the interest of the United States." Since when is there such an emergency there that 40-odd newsmen are allowed to go, but one Member of the Congress, who has certain responsibilities, which I sought to point out here this afternoon, is not allowed to go? This is the answer to the question whether the discretion would be exercised correctly. I say that this is another example where the intent of this administration to keep facts away from the Congress is very plain.

Mr. MEYER. I wonder what would happen if I, as a member of the Far Eastern Affairs Subcommittee, or Far Eastern Pacific, would request a passport to go there.

Mr. PORTER. I think I can tell the gentleman—and I hope he will make such a request. The gentleman is certainly entitled, indeed obliged, to see what the situation is at firsthand, so that he can then evaluate the many problems.

Mr. MEYER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. KASEM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KASEM. On page 4, line 19, subsection (3) of section 201, it provides that the President shall have the power by appropriate annual declaration to restrain travel—he is not talking about passports—of all citizens and to limit the validity of all passports with respect to travel to the following places:

> 3. Countries or areas to which the President finds that travel must be restricted in the national interest either because the U.S. Government is unable to provide adequate protection to citizens traveling therein or because such travel would seriously impair the foreign relations of the United States.

Now, am I to understand and does the gentleman understand with me that if the President of the United States determines that it would impair international relations or the foreign relations of the United States, he could imprison every citizen in the United States, within the boundaries of the United States? Is that right?

Mr. PORTER. I think he would have to violate the law first by going there.

Mr. KASEM. No. It says "to restrain the travel of all citizens."

Mr. PORTER. You are perhaps talking about the legal definition of "imprisonment?"

Mr. KASEM. Subsection 3, page 4. It does not say in time of war or otherwise. In other words, if I want to go and see firsthand by myself what the conditions are abroad so that I can give a most conscientious vote on the matters that come before this Congress, I have got to have the President's permission.

Mr. PORTER. Yes.

Mr. KASEM. I think that is a bad law.

Mr. PORTER. I say to the gentleman from California that it has not been denied on the floor here today that this bill would give unbridled discretion to the President of the United States to decide what areas of the world are to be off limits and who shall go there. That is provided specifically here. It says that anybody that the President wants to have go will be allowed to go, and the President does not need to say why he makes the exception. Indeed, it has not been denied; it has been glorified in by some who say that the President ought to have this power and that we ought to give up this power.

Mr. KASEM. I would never impose that responsibility on any President, Democratic or Republican, and no one unless he has dictatorial ambitions, should ever want it; is that right?

Mr. PORTER. I think he would be better off without it.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, the truth of the matter is that the President always has the responsibility of the security of the Nation, whether he has it by law or not.

Mr. PORTER. Yes.

Mr. FASCELL. By virtue of the fact that he is President.

Mr. PORTER. But how far we let him go depends on the doctrine of the Constitution, especially the first, fifth and ninth amendments, among other things, all of which would be violated. We should not be worried about violations in court; we should be concerned here about the kind of legislation which reduces the liberties of American citizens.

Mr. FASCELL. The gentleman will admit, will he not, that there is information now here in Washington which the gentleman is not entitled to and does not receive as a Congressman, because, from the executive viewpoint and under his responsibility, it affects national security, and therefore he cannot have it?

Mr. PORTER. I am glad to see that the gentleman is coming around to my viewpoint because, when there is information which I am not allowed to get it is because of its nature, because of its being highly confidential, highly secret.

Mr. FASCELL. I am glad to see that the gentleman is coming around to my viewpoint.

Mr. PORTER. It is done only under special circumstances and in this I see no such special circumstances with regard to any country in the world that we should keep——

Mr. FASCELL. That is the opinion of the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PORTER. That we should keep American citizens from going within their boundaries. These countries may keep us out, but under our history and traditions as a free Nation we should not be told that we are not free to let our citizens go any place in the world.

Mr. FASCELL. I would certainly agree with that last statement of the gentleman, but I would say——

Mr. PORTER. I am glad that the gentleman has accepted my viewpoint.

Mr. FASCELL. I have not accepted the gentleman's viewpoint by any long stretch of the imagination. The gentleman's construction of my answer is just as strained as his construction of the law, as his construction of the President's responsibility, and as his construction of his own responsibility.

Mr. PORTER. I will withdraw my remark if the gentleman will recognize that his own remarks are frivolous, too.

Mr. FASCELL. I wil certainly not admit that my remarks are frivolous and I would not ask the gentleman to withdraw his remarks at all, because I would want his to stand by the test of logic and reasonableness, as I would require mine to stand the same test.

I should like to ask the gentleman this question. Will he admit that there is a difference in responsibility with respect to problems of foreign affairs and problems of national security as between the President of the United States and the Representative from Oregon?

Mr. PORTER. Of course. We each under the Constitution have our own duties. One of my duties is to seek facts everywhere, in books, personally, so that my decisions may be as wise and as responsible as possible within my very human limitations.

Mr. KASEM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KASEM. During this past Congress I have sometimes despaired of my usefulness as a Congressman to the people of the United States and I have thought perhaps I could better serve the interests of the free world if I went to the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, in that great continent of Africa, where they are groping for democracy and the way to go as the age of industrialization comes upon them. I thought perhaps I could be of greater service both to the United States and to every man. I thought I might like to go down there and help them get an educational system started, have them learn something of the technology of the United States. But in order for me to do that, if this were the law, if the President of the United States were to determine that this was not in the best interests of the international relations of the United States, I would not be able to go; is that right?

Mr. PORTER. That is right. It would be up to the President to decide, in his own unbridled discretion.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield.

Mr. JUDD. The bill requires, not that the travel be determined to be merely unfavorable to or not in the best interests of the United States; it would have to "seriously impair the foreign relations of the United States." The language of the bill is quite different from the language the gentleman used—it would have to "seriously impair."

Mr. PORTER. Let me point out to the gentleman from Minnesota that there is no way to question the President's decision under this because, as has been pointed out, he has the power to decide what is the foreign policy of the United States. All that he has to do every year is to say what he thinks. If we do not like it, we can go to the stump but we cannot change it and the gentleman from California [Mr. KASEM] would still be kept out of the Sudan.

Mr. JUDD. That does not go along with the argument that the gentleman has used here repeatedly, namely, that the people of America can be trusted with the facts, that they can and will make their own judgments. If the President of the United States were to make such a decision on a frivolous basis, unbridled, without solid cause, an abuse of his authority, the gentleman knows as well as anyone what an avalanche of public condemnation would come upon his head. It is unthinkable that any President would use capriciously or arbitrarily or irresponsibly this authority, and no President ever has in the whole history of our country, before the authority was questioned last year by the Supreme Court. But a President would be derelict in his duty and irresponsible if he did not exercise this authority whenever he is convinced that the activities or the presence abroad of a given American, whether a Congressman or whatever, would in a particular situation seriously impair the conduct of our foreign affairs, which the Constitution—not this law—places in his hands.

Mr. PORTER. That is, in his opinion. But I say to the gentleman that ours is a Government of checks and balances and we do not suspend all these checks and balances and the doctrine of the separation of power for 4 years and then decide whether or not the President has done the right things. Of course, we criticize the President if we think he has violated any of these doctrines, but we do not suspend them. We say that we are going to give him the discretion and we hope that he exercises it rightly. But we maintain the checks and balances and we are going to maintain the separation of powers doctrine also, I believe.

Mr. JUDD. But the Constitution itself gives him the authority in this field. If we do not like the way he conducts our foreign relations, we have ultimately only one appeal. That is to impeach the President.

Mr. PORTER. I agree that it would help the President in carrying out his foreign policy to have this power, just as it would help him if he were given the opportunity and the privilege of reading all of our speeches before we gave them, or of reading all of the editorials in the newspapers before they were printed. But we are not going to give up those freedoms because we balance them against the advantage that it would be to him.

Mr. KASEM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KASEM. The gentleman from Minnesota and I believe in Almighty God, but I do not believe that Almighty God has been elected the President of the United States yet. We have consistently and persistently delegated the powers of this Congress to the executive branch with these rules like "in the public interest" and "reasonable conditions exist" and so on. We have hardly passed a piece of legislation in this session which was not a delegation of authority to the executive, it was an abandonment of our congressional duties. In view of the famous, I think it was, Butler decision in the poultry case under the NRA where it was held unconstitutional when the Congress delegated this authority—what are we going to be faced with in these matters?

Mr. PORTER. I thank the gentleman. I suppose no one wants to make the veto power of the President absolute in any matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

U.S. CONSTITUTION: THE POWER IN THE STATE AND PEOPLE

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, a grave constitutional crisis was precipitated in 1954 by the Brown case ruling of the U.S. Supreme Court. That decision, required forced integration in public schools of the States, was largely based on theories of a Swedish and other sociologists—evolution, not revolution is the answer. Thoughtful citizens throughout the Nation were shocked at this constitutionally unauthorized assumption of legislative power.

What at the time appeared a matter affecting only school administration has now expanded into the greatest constitutional issue in our history. It affects practically every facet of American life, not only the specific questions of forced racial integration in public schools but also such matters as the destruction of vast real estate values, taxation to cover the costs of enforcement and resistance, harassment of State officials and their diversion from pressing problems requiring concentrated attention, causing of strife between races where harmonious relations previously existed, attempted breaking of wills, impairment of our educational systems at the very time we are lagging in educational production as compared to that in the Soviet Union, and even an armed Federal assault on the capital city of Arkansas and the illegal military occupation of its high school, coupled with the unconstitutional federalization of that State's militia.

The tragic events in Little Rock, still fresh in our minds, helped to dramatize the gravest issue involved: Constitutional liberty or administrative centralism.

The great mass of our press, editors, and commentators, through ignorance or design, have failed to clarify the constitutional issues. Few voices were raised to show the way out of a situation as grave as that of 1776.

Meanwhile, many States, in ill-advised efforts to protect their people from long recognized evils of integration, resorted to counter coercive measures, which inevitably proved to be legal "booby traps." Thus, the time is overdue for a rigorous clarification of the constitutional issues involved—questions which transcend all partisan and personal considerations and must be determined on the highest plateau of patriotism and statesmanship.

Among the first important steps at clarification was creation by the Commonwealth of Virginia of its Commission on Constitutional Government, a body of distinguished membership. In a statement on September 9, 1958, on the fixing of boundary lines in Federal-State relations, this body laid the groundwork for national debate and appealed to the people of all the States to reflect upon the serious constitutional dangers of the course set in motion by the 1954 Brown case ruling.

Did the great metropolitan press and other molders of mass opinion meet this challenge and present an adequate treatment of the issues? They did not.

It was, however, taken up by a small western newspaper, the Pioche Record, of Pioche, Lincoln County, Nev. In a remarkable series of editorials starting on October 23, 1958, it undertook to deal adequately with the constitutional issues, attracting attention of thoughtful leaders in many parts of the Nation, including State legislatures and the Congress.

Featured by simple and incisive expression that eliminates the inconsequential and focuses on the fundamental, these editorials effectively clarify the constitutional powers in the State and people and show the way out of the dangerously explosive situation provoked by the usurpations of the sociologically minded Warren Supreme Court.

Dealing with questions as complicated and hazardous as those which faced the Founders of our Federal Government, these Pioche Record editorials measure up to the standards of the celebrated "Federalist Papers" by Alexander Hamilton, John Jay, and James Madison. The "Federalist Papers" aimed at creating the Federal Union; the Pioche Record papers at its preservation.

As such they are commended for study by all concerned with the problems of maintaining State sovereignty and individual liberty under our system of constitutional government. But especially are they commended to cognizant agencies in our Federal and State governments; our high schools, colleges, and universities in the fields of history, political science, and law; and the professional and lay press of the Nation.

To all these intellectual and governmental leaders, I would stress that under our constitutional system of government, the people are sovereign and organized into an indestructible Union composed of indestructible States. The people realize that they have suffered loss of their rights and liberties because of usurpation of power by officers of their Government. Moreover, they are determined to retrieve them through constitutional processes.

Also, I would emphasize to those studying these matters that school racial segregation or race mixing, public schools or private schools, or even the recent Supreme Court assault on one of the Biblical commandments that in some States is embodied in law, are not the real issues, but only the effects of criminal usurpations. The real issues are constitutional questions which, when properly resolved, should effect a return to constitutional morality.

The solution is not through negative evasive tactics to what is legally unauthorized or by other confusing distractions, but in the positive method of the States taking firm legal stands in the enforcement of the Constitution with provisions for adequate sanctions against usurpers.

In order that these splendid contributions may be available to the Nation, I include as part of these remarks the full texts of the Pioche Record editorials followed by the September 9, 1958, statement of the Virginia Commission on Constitutional Government:

THE SUPREME COURT, THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES, AND THE SOUTH'S PUBLIC SCHOOL PROBLEM

Recent decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court have subjected that wing of our Government to what is perhaps the sharpest criticism it has received at any time in the history of this country. One of the most far-reaching of these is in relation to the decision of the Court which directs who can attend what schools maintained by the States of Arkansas and Virginia.

The President has expressed concern over some of the Court's rulings. The Legislature of the State of Virginia has appointed a special commission to study and report on the decisions of the Court, as they relate to their powers to regulate attendance at schools maintained by the taxpayers of the State and which may require white children to attend colored schools in some cases, where it is contrary to their wishes.

Newsweek in its October 20 issue, quotes retired Federal Judge Learned Hand as saying: "When the Court strikes down a law because it does not 'commend itself to the Court's notion of justice,' then the Court is usurping the function of the legislative branch and becomes, in effect, 'a third legislative chamber.' "

THE SHARPEST CRITICISM

But, says Newsweek, "The sharpest criticism that the Court has received from American jurists came at the conference of State Chief Justices, in California, last August. There an overwhelming majority—36 to 8—voted for a resolution charging that the Court 'too often has tended to adopt the role of policymaker without proper judicial restraint.' " Continuing, Newsweek says, "such criticism of the highest tribunal by the Nation's top State judges was without precedent, and it was a hard blow at the Court's battered prestige."

The keynote of the report of the Virginia Commission is that the Supreme Court by its mandate is in effect making a new law. It is not ruling, as a Court, in accord with the established law. It is upsetting the law—law which has been established by enactments of the lawmaking power, founded in the Constitution and stabilized by prior rulings of the highest Court and so administered over a long period of years.

This upsetting of the clear intent of the Constitution as well as upsetting established law, is a revolutionary movement which brings about what is classed by Senator HARRY BYRD as the gravest crisis since the War Between the States. Not that the Supreme Court should dictate who in their opinion is to attend what schools but that the Court should supersede the State in directing the management of the State's schools, without clear authorization under the Constitution giving it the power to do so.

THE 14TH AMENDMENT

The Virginia Commission in its report issued on September 9, 1958, makes the following observations: "The 14th amendment, leaving aside all questions of the validity of its adoption, was conceived primarily as a prohibitory amendment. It was intended to prohibit to the States certain powers they had exercised in the past; specifically, the States were prohibited from denying to any citizen the 'equal protection of the laws'—the rights, for example, to own property, to enter into contracts, and to sue and be sued.

"Clearly, the Congress that framed the 14th amendment, and the States that ratified it, never intended for an instant that a guarantee of equal protection of the laws was to affect the operation of separate schools in any way. Long after the amendment was ratified, States both north and south continued to maintain racially separate institutions. It is unthinkable that they understood the amendment to prohibit them from the exercise of powers they were daily exercising.

"The correctness of this understanding was confirmed repeatedly by the highest State and Federal courts in an unbroken line of decisions stretching over many years. It was confirmed, also, by the tacit acquiescence of the States themselves. When the doctrine of separate but equal was sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1896, not a single State voiced a protest or asserted a misinterpretation of the amendment. And Congress, from the date of the amendment until the date of the school segregation cases, demonstrated its understanding of the amendment by actively maintaining separate schools in the District of Columbia. Thus the boundary line was fixed. By what authority may it now be changed?

THE COURT'S ORDER IS WITHOUT AUTHORITY

"The position of the Southern States today is that the governmental power they exercised constitutionally for so many years—the power to maintain racially separate schools—cannot be prohibited to them by a mandate of the Supreme Court. Many persons, it appears, believe that the Court has the right, as well as the power, to impose this prohibition upon the States as an addition to the law of the land. In actual fact, the Court's mandate is no more than the law of the case in which it is handed down; the Court's power is a judicial power, not a legislative power, and it is worth emphasizing that there is now no law and no provision of the Constitution requiring racially integrated schools. In effect the Court sought not merely to interpret the Constitution, but substantively to amend the Constitution, and this the Court has no authority to do."

Another question: Is it for the Federal courts to undertake to enforce their decisions through injunction proceedings? While such a course may be taken against officers of the United States it is beyond the authority granted by the State if exercised against an officer of the State. It then becomes an unauthorized act and it may be a forceful invasion of the rights of the State.

A TOWERING QUESTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY

No such power has been granted to the Federal Government but on the contrary such power has been specifically denied, except on the request of the Governor of the State whose constitutional rights are invaded. It then becomes the problem of the State to determine how can the dignity and lawful powers of the State be defended from the unlawful and aggressive interference by the Federal Government. And this is the outstanding question.

The recent report of the special commission of the Virginia Legislature classes this as "a towering question of constitutional government which transcends the immediate and personal issues of particular children in particular schools. The human conflicts presented over the South's public schools are real, are complex and cannot be minimized." Then the report points out the principle of government wherein the solution lies, namely that, "our Union is a union of States. That is what it was in the beginning and that is what it remains today. In this Union, all power to govern flows from the people in their States. Some powers the people have delegated, under the Constitution, to Federal authority; all other powers they have reserved, under the Constitution to themselves."

THE VIEWS OF STATESMEN AND JUSTICES

The commission in concluding its report points out that these apprehensions are not peculiar to the South in 1958; Washington voiced them in his Farewell Address. Lincoln many times emphasized the same points. Holmes, Hughes, Sutherland, Harlan, Taney, among a host of great jurists, have insisted down through the years on strict adherence to the rule, in Hughes' phrase, that "it is not for the Court to amend the Constitution by judicial decree." More recently, Mr. Justice Black has asserted that it is not for the Supreme Court "to roam at large in the broad expanse of policy and morals, and to trespass on the legislative domain of the States." Mr. Justice Douglas has warned that "instability is created" when "a judiciary with life tenure seeks to write its social and economic creed into the charter." The late Chief Justice Vinson emphasized that, "because the Court must rest its decisions on the Constitution alone, we must set aside predilections on social policy and adhere to the settled rules which restrict the exercise of our power to judicial review."

The Conference of Chief Justices of 44 States in their meeting in August proclaimed as "sound doctrine" the following words of Elihu Root:

"If the people of our country yield to impatience which would destroy the system that alone makes effective these great impersonal rules and preserves our constitutional government, rather than to endure the temporary inconvenience of pursuing regulated methods of changing the law, we shall not be reforming, we shall not be making progress, but shall be exhibiting * * * the lack of that self-control which enables great bodies of men to abide the slow process of orderly government, rather than to break down the barriers of order when they are struck by the impulse of the moment."

THE BECLOUDED BUT REAL ISSUE

In response to these appeals, the people are called to face the question:

Can the Supreme Court overrule the law as already made and established? Can they put into effect a new law prompted by political or social aims which happen to be the personal views of the members of the Court and not approved by the people, who are the high source of all lawmaking powers under the theory of government set forth in the Declaration of Independence. Shall the Court be permitted to usurp the amendatory power which under the Constitution requires the ratifying vote of three-fourths of the States?

Especially, shall they be permitted to do these things where such grave consequences must follow from disrupting the happy relation, achieved only with greatest difficulty, of two races living together in the same localities, with mutual respect and esteem and often with mutually affectionate regard?

Collateral details enter, but should not becloud the main matter for consideration which is not what shall be done, or how the States should proceed in solving their problems or how long it should take in working out the solution, but rather the immediate question is, who has the right or legal power to interfere with the States in the exercise of their own judgment in the solution of their problems.

And the further question, shall we disintegrate and destroy that bulwark of our liberties—the Constitution of the United States, under which after throwing off foreign rule, there was given to the States which elected to join in, the assurance against future foreign rule for them, by the provision that all rights not specifically given up to the planned association were reserved to each of those who would join in and further that the agreed plans of the association could not be changed, altered, corrected or improved without the voted assent of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

The Virginia Commission on Constitutional Government in concluding its report, appeals to "our sister States"—"to view the matter dispassionately, and not fail to perceive the grave danger to all State powers that lies in the Court's drastic action here."

[From the Pioche (Nev.) Record, Nov. 6, 1958]

OUR CONSTITUTION—SHALL WE DESTROY IT—OR AMEND IT?

In a recent issue of the Pioche Record we published parts of a report of the Virginia Commission on Constitutional Government.

That report charges that the U.S. Supreme Court, an agency of judicial powers, has usurped governmental powers; that its decision, which has since had the result of forcing schools to be closed, schools which were being operated under the management of the State, is void and lacking in legal effect. The report is a challenge to the U.S. Government as to its operations under a void and illegal order of Court.

It would be difficult to overestimate the importance of this report of the Virginia Commission, in view of the determined attitude of the State to defend its right to manage State schools, without interference from the National Government.

If the Legislature of Virginia, by its regular lawful procedure, should endorse and approve this report, and make it an action of the State, we would face an amazing situation: The State of Virginia, a government of plenary powers, in dealing with a government of no primary powers at all, but only secondary or delegated powers, is charging its created agency with having acted beyond the powers granted to it, and further of attempting to enforce this assumed authority.

It is to be noted as a detail, that this coercive attempt is against a Government from which their lawfully delegated powers were derived. It is also to be noted that when the execution of these delegated powers was entrusted to the agency Government, created for that purpose; namely the United States of America, oaths of office were to be required from all important employees of the agency government, so that they would not exceed the authority granted to them. All their acts were to be in accord with this authority, and their oath of office even goes so far as to require them to preserve, defend and protect these limitations to their power.

WHAT IS THE LAW?

The order of the Court in question is not a judicial determination of an issue at law. The law having long ago been determined differently the Court's act amounts to legislation, or to a new law, changing an old law. It is without authority under the Constitution to do this, says the Virginia Commission. In such case it is not an order of a Court at all. Under our law an order lacking in authority is void. What in law is void is a nullity. It does not exist. There is no order of a Court to be enforced in a case where Constitutional authority is lacking.

Let us assume that the facts as stated by this report of the Virginia Commission are later sustained by formal approval of the State, and the report, or some modification of it, becomes a legislative act and a formal declaration of the State of Virginia. In that case the charges against the National Government, of which the Supreme Court is but one branch, may be compared with the events at the time when the effort of the British Government to collect taxes on tea in Boston, levied without the consent of the people, led to action by the unorganized "minutemen" of Massachusetts.

And the action of the executive branch of the U.S. Government in sending troops into Arkansas, to enforce the rule of a court acting without constitutional authority, may be compared with the sending of British troops to enforce foreign edicts and to arrest citizens of Massachusetts, on orders originating in England.

Has the President of the United States sent the Nation's military force into a State to enforce an order of a group of men lacking in authority? So states the Virginia Commission, and if the State of Virginia through its legislative branch adopts this as its determination, we have a ruling from a higher legal authority than the Supreme Court because it is the source of the authority given to the Supreme Court.

MILITARY MIGHT

The President has sent in troops and he says the orders of the Court must be enforced. The commission takes up the question, whether the Court's orders are valid and declare them to be invalid. They are lacking in authority at the base of the proceedings. And if the State of Virginia adopts and approves this report of its commission the exact issue is formally matured. It is laid down on the line for solution. And the solution must be by law and not by force.

The Constitution as adjudicated and administered for half a century had fixed the law to be that States can have separate but equal school facilities, under the 14th amendment. This construction by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1896, was approved, consented to and practiced by all of the States, including the District of Columbia. This crystallizes and permanently establishes the law. How can this be changed?

Says the Virginia Commission, an act of legislation can be changed by Congress, an act of the Constitution can be changed by amendments as allowed under the Constitution, which requires the ratification of three-fourths of the States, but the Supreme Court cannot legislate at all, either to change an act of Congress, to change the Constitution provisions or to change the law.

The Virginia Commission makes another and less important point. For the "equal protection of the law" provision of the 14th amendment to be construed so as to give power to regulate schools leads to the question was it so intended? What is meant by "protection of the law?" Was it intended to give the Supreme Court the power to regulate the liquor laws of Mississippi, or the gambling laws of Nevada, so that all of its citizens may have "equal protection of the laws" from the use of liquor or from losses from gambling.

WHO IS TO MAINTAIN OUR CONSTITUTION?

If the President of the United States sent the military power into Nevada to enforce a Court ruling that the 14th amendment of "equal protection of the law" was violated, would there be any remedy somewhere in the framework of our law for this assumption of power to be classed as a usurpation?

Of course with the State of Nevada the case is different. Nevada did not take an independent position among the nations of the world before the United States was formed. Nevada did not create or delegate powers to the United States. Nevada was created by the United States. Nevada as a government is secondary not primary. However it too in some way should be protected from the Government's encroachment on its rights.

If the members of the Supreme Court take an oath of office which requires them to support and maintain the Constitution of the United States, and if the State of Virginia charges that they have upset the law as established under the Constitution and have promulgated a new and different law, what shall be the source of power, and what the proceedings, to call a halt on such usurpation of power?

If the authorized government of Virginia declares the Supreme Court lacks constitutional powers, and the Supreme Court declared they have not transgressed their constitutional powers, where are we?

ACTION TO REPLACE WORDS

We have arrived at a point where what has been nebulous is definite. What before has been conversation becomes action. Words and conversation are converted into concrete legal positions and the higher law must govern. And the law to be applied is extremely simple. If the authority resides in the Court its position is supported, otherwise not. But the Court cannot be an autocratic arbiter of its own authority where that is denied by the source of the authority granted and where there is the provision that all authority not granted is specifically denied.

The simple process of history leads us to the solution of the problem. The State must decide what to do when it is faced with a usurpation of powers it has reserved and now declines to give up. Where the U.S. Government happens to be the usurper, this becomes a detail that should not confuse the legal construction.

In such a situation the U.S. Government is being called upon to respond to the charge made by the State, and to disclose wherein the power was conferred upon it to run the schools of the State of Virginia, and it must show that power was given expressly and not inferentially. In such a legal study no construction of language can confer power on the Supreme Court. It must be plainly stated. So plainly stated in fact that it must have been the intent of the State, when the language was ratified, to convey the powers claimed.

It is to be presumed that the U.S. Government will respond if a charge is brought against it by the State of Virginia and that it will avail itself of the opportunity to remove the cause of complaint.

LAWFUL PROCEDURE

The Congress of the United States may find a solution by proposing a constitutional amendment so as to do legally what is attempted to be done illegally and thus clear away the doubts and differences. But the officials of the United States will lack governmental power to obstruct the States until this action, or some other action that meets the situation, is taken by the Congress.

The State can proceed along the lines directed by established law until U.S. agents exert physical force to stop the operation of its law. Then let the conduct of such agencies be surveyed in the light of law. If they lack authority they are as private citizens and responsible to the State for their conduct. Invalid immunity does not protect them from the consequence of resisting officers of the State. Federal proceedings and Federal authority can be questioned by the State authorities as to validity, as can any other proceedings or authority. Nowhere in the Constitution are the orders of a Federal court made immune from questioning by the government of the State affected.

THE PRESIDENT MUST OBEY THE LAW

Then what becomes of the power of the Executive to send troops to enforce what is claimed to be a law but which, as far as these States are concerned, lacks the authority of law and is so declared and ordered by the State. Troops cannot make law even if clothed in the pretense of enforcing law.

The Governor of Arkansas has called for a vote of the people and their mandate is overwhelmingly to the effect that the State shall run its own business and let the National Government and the other States run theirs.

The constitution of Virginia requires its government to "establish and maintain an efficient system of public schools." Is it not logical or reasonable, for an agency created by a government of State, and created with limited powers, to tell the State how it can be permitted to carry out the mandates of its own constitution?

Military might can close the schools of these States but it cannot force their people to abide by foreign-made laws, and what they have formally declared to be invalid laws, any more than British troops could force the people of Boston to abide by the laws of Parliament.

[From the Pioche (Nev.) Record, Nov. 27, 1958]

THE CONSTITUTION, THE COURTS, AND THE NEVADA MINING INDUSTRY

In a recent issue of this paper there appeared an editorial quoting extensively from the report of the Virginia Commission on Constitutional Government.

This editorial under the heading, "The Constitution, The Supreme Court, and the South's Public School Problem," has received unexpected widely spread comment and gratifying expressions of interest. Among these received is one from the editor of one of the leading papers in Virginia enclosing a scholarly and ably edited and documented report by the Committee for Courts of Justice of the Virginia Senate.

The purport of this report is that the State is committed to "resist encroachment by the Supreme Court, through judicial legislation, upon the reserved powers of the State," and it points out that "in every State and in every region, there are certain critical domestic problems of a State, or regional, character that wisely should be left for solution to the people most intimately familiar with them." Which proposed action, as far as Nevada is concerned, points an eloquent finger at the present paralysis of its principal and basic industry, an industry now largely inactive, which in the past has contributed so much to the wealth of the Nation. Without the fabulous monetary wealth produced from Nevada's mines in the early seventies extreme doubt has been expressed as to how, if at all, we could have emerged from our paper-money debacle at that time.

Incidentally this gave the only excuse there was for elevating Nevada with a few hundred population to the position of a State, so as to furnish the one extra vote needed to amend the Constitution and make legal the measures the Government had promised, and some of which now are concerned in this present situation.

BILL OF RIGHTS

This report of the Senate Committee also points out that before the State of Virginia signed the contract which gave away a part of the powers it held as an independent nation, achieved at so tremendous a cost by the treaty of peace in the war with England, it took extreme precautionary measures. The subordinate agency Government to which it assigned these powers was to be rigorously held within the limits of the contract being agreed to. And the State's convention demanded that a Bill of Rights be made a part of this contract. This Bill of Rights required among other things that all powers not granted were reserved to the States and that in the event of the exercise of arbitrary power it must be accepted as a matter of principle "that the doctrine of nonresistance against arbitrary power and oppression is absurd, slavish, and destructive of the good and happiness of mankind."

The State now claims the right to exercise this provision by all means within its reserved legal powers and appeals to "her sister States for that decision which only they are qualified under our mutual compact to make."

It would appear that assistance can be given in two ways. One by a clarifying amendment to the Constitution which would appear not at all necessary as the present wording is sufficiently clear and definite, if the language is construed in the light of what was intended by the signatory parties at the time of their agreement to it. Any deviation from this intent would be clearly in violation of established law which would be beyond the power of the Court and would so invalidate its ruling.

If it is desired to change this intent as already established for over half a century then any such desired change could properly be effected by a constitutional amendment.

The other course for the State would be to declare what is the status of the law in the particular State in view of the ultra vires nature and consequent illegality of the Court's decision, where they find the facts to justify such legislation.

This is a procedure discussed briefly in our editorial of November 6, the purpose of which was to invite discussion and study rather than any effort to elucidate any particular method of escape from the condition of affairs now pressing so seriously in these States.

THE STATE OF NEVADA IS CONCERNED

The State of Nevada has no reason to be particularly concerned over the segregation question, but Nevada as a mining State is very much concerned with the depression of the developments of its mineral wealth through a similar misuse of the powers and processes of the Federal courts.

Also Nevada has suffered much along with the rest of the country from the officials of the United States, its courts and its legislative bodies, not being required to hold to their oaths of office which are intended to confine their actions strictly within the limits of their constitutional powers. The application of this matter to Nevada may not be of such immediate or critical concern as the closing of schools in other States, but it has mowed a broad swath of ruin to Nevada's basic industry.

The mines of Nevada have quite generally been closed as the cumulative result of laws which are little understood. The principal ones of these laws were arbitrarily not allowed to be debated in the House of Representatives (steamroller tactics) and for some reason they received little or no analytical discussion in the Senate. In the most important of these laws the time which should have been allowed for action was so limited that not a single Member of the House had read the bill when it voted its passage. Under such pressure as this they passed a law which brushed aside constitutional requirements, binding on both the legislative and the executive branches of the Government and as predicted has been followed by billions being added each year to the national debt.

MISAPPLICATION OF THE POWERS OF THE COURTS

As far as this discussion concerns the judicial department in relation to Nevada, it may be said that a large part of the area in this important mineral district at Pioche, has been held in idleness over a long period of years by the misuse of the processes and powers of the District Federal court and by its refusal for a long time to obey the orders of the higher court, meanwhile, from such parts of this area as were permitted to operate, there was produced more lead and zinc than any other area in Nevada and its full share of the production in the United States.

In the brief filed recently with the Court in that case we find the following:

"Therefore the key to the question of reinstating the original complaint brings in the more important question of how the instrumentalities of our law have been used, and how they can be used, as an instrument for depressing a business enterprise, and this despite the best and most diligent attention as far as the courts are concerned.

"There is much discussion today about a world of free enterprise. The issues in this case, in papers filed 18 years ago, and which have never been allowed to be tried, touch the question, Is there a world of free enterprise and are we part of it?"

For these reasons it could be expected that the State of Nevada, in principle will lend a willing ear to the appeal of the Virginia State Commission, for help in the position it is in, but more properly after the issue is more clearly defined. After the governments of the affected States speak and pronounce that as far as those affected States are concerned, the ruling of the Supreme Court in the Brown Case is not law in Virginia and the actions of the members of that Court exceeds their constitutional authority, and the resulting orders are therefore null and void and of no effect as far as they conflict with the laws of Virginia.

Until then no matter how far beyond its powers is the action of the Court, nor how definitely the Court exceeds its authority, the President can and perhaps should, consider it his duty to enforce the formally expressed veiws of the members of the Court without giving his consideration to the question of what were the powers or rights of the members of the Court to render the decision.

After all the question of what are the powers of the Court is a matter more properly to be determined by the States whose laws are being interfered with or from States from whom the Court's powers have been derived, and those which alone have familiarity with the conditions to which the laws are being applied, on the principle that the powers of Government are derived from the consent of the governed.

THE ADVANTAGE OF A FIXED LEGAL POSITION

Despite the forceful, convincing, and eloquent appeals of committees and delegations and individuals within these objecting States, their lawmaking powers have not spoken. They have not formally proclaimed that the opinion in question is merely the views expressed by men, who happen to be members of the Supreme Court and is not the expression of a court whose opinion would be competent if based on constitutional authority and therefore cannot be considered the law within the jurisdiction of their State.

As soon as the State takes this step it becomes definite what its legal position is but until then all objections are but a matter of words which leaves the matter in such position that the orders of the Court must be considered the law. After the governments of Virginia or Arkansas take this step they are challenging the application of the Court's ruling to the laws of their State. Then the only question that can be raised is whether the legislation of the State or the ruling of the Court are the law in that State. It is doubtful, in such a case, if the President would apply force to suppress the State in carrying out its laws applicable to the situation, because in that State the Supreme Court ruling has been rendered of at least doubtful authority. The State law must then stand until this doubt is removed. The State is the source, and the Court or the National Government is the recipient, of the powers in question and where there is doubt the States have the authority.

The sister States can then make definite their position on one side or the other of this question. The States that are affected have the power to speak, where the rulings of the Court conflict with their laws. They are either the parties to the contract which gives, and limits, the powers to be exercised by the Court, or they have acquired the same privilege when they became a State.

But if Arkansas or Virginia speak and with the voice of their duly constituted government, they declare that the action of the Court is not within the power given it and declare the action of the Court to be null and void as far as the State is concerned, the matter then becomes a question between two governments, the government of the State with all of its primary powers except those it has delegated, and the agency government possessed of only secondary or delegated powers, which powers have been relinquished to it by the State.

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT IS THE ESSENCE OF THE CONTROVERSY

It then has become a question of the construction of a contract, between the two parties to the contract, thus eliminating the frills and fancies and entanglements that are brought in by the agencies of these governments, who cannot properly be the arbiters of their own powers nor the judges of their own actions.

The whole question is then susceptible of orderly discussion and action instead of remaining in the present confused state, which has resulted from efforts to experiment with the application of the Court's ruling to laws of the State, and to head off by this means conflict between State and Federal authorities. This is an indirect approach which was bound to fail in view of the Court's assuming an executive as well as a legislative role, but it gives the advantage of making definite that a well backed, determined effort was organized and at work, to break up the established and well progressed plan under which two races were living together with increasing mutual trust and confidence and the majority of both being contented with the steady improvement being carried on in their relationship.

In his letter to President Eisenhower, Mr. Carleton Putnam, of Boston, expresses this idea in the following words:

"Indeed, there now seems little doubt that the Court's recent decision has set back the cause of the Negro in the South by a generation. He may force his way into white schools, but he will not force his way into white hearts nor earn the respect he seeks. What evolution was slowly and wisely achieving, revolution has now arrested, and the trail of bitterness will lead far."

[From the Pioche (Nev.) Record, Jan. 1, 1959]

THE PLIGHT OF OUR CONSTITUTIONAL SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT

The Constitution of the United States has achieved world recognition for having established individual personal freedom and opportunity to an extent never before even approached in the history of governments. There is now a sudden realization that there has come about a change.

This change is not the result of laws drafted by representatives of the people as authorized by the Constitution. In certain instances Congress has delegated its duties, without the constitutional right or authority to do so, to specially selected bodies of men who are not responsible to and not expressive of, the will or the wishes of the people. Another case is where the Supreme Court steps out of its authorized field and asserts governmental powers to back up invalid orders which are nothing more than the opinions of men without authority.

The United States as a whole faces such a state of affairs in various large sections of the Nation that we are brought to a realization of a far-reaching fact.

That fact is that the Revolutionary War, whereunder the colonies gained their independence, was fought to remedy what had become an unbearable evil, but more important than that to establish the remedy as a matter of principle that "the right to govern rests upon the consent of the governed."

This principle was the basis of the agreement among the colonies, who then became separate and independent nations, a pact called the Constitution of the United States. The purpose of that agreement was threefold (1) to assign certain well defined and strictly limited powers to a central agency called the Federal Government and (2) more important to reserve, to the nations which formed the federation, complete authority and control of their own governments, called State governments. (3) Most important of all to assure the prevention of any expansion of, or Federal encroachment on, the rights, reserved by the States.

THE SITUATION IN ITS GENERAL ASPECT

We now find productive industry in the States in a critical condition. Agriculture dependent upon taxpayers buying their crops to be wasted, mining industry closed down to allow imports of metals so as to export manufactured products thus to overcome the effects of depressed world commerce and now we add to that the sudden realization that in certain large sections of the Nation the educational system is in a critical state because of the resistance of the people to the enforcement of laws not of their own making or approval.

We now wake up to the fact that there has been a growing encroachment upon all freedom of action by the individual citizen in all sections of the country, especially upon the businessman who is not a part of the large and generally secretly controlled business organizations, so that it is difficult for the ordinary businessman to maintain himself in business.

On a studied reflection this sad and widespread state of affairs all springs out of the administration of bureaucratically made and enforced laws, all of which are in violation of the spirit and intent and definite wording of the Constitution.

A LESSON FROM HISTORY

The Southern States seem to be bewildered as to their rights and their powers, almost exactly as they seemed to be in 1861. Instead of taking a legal position, one that was legally correct, and putting it up to the Federal Government to make the next move, history has repeated itself and they have resorted to hastily considered, and what now appears to be ill-advised, countercoercive measures.

In 1861 South Carolina could have permitted the forts to be reinforced and asserted its legal position. Its reply to the President could have included criticism for threats to use force and for the improper conduct to its commissioners, thus pointing to a moral basis for a world public opinion, while leaving their rights to be determined by law, not by force.

Up to that time the legal position of South Carolina was unassailable. Its correctness did not depend upon the occupancy of the forts. Reinforcing the forts, and the threats to use force, was a trap to bring about the war, just as Mr. Toombs said it was at the Cabinet meeting where the ill-fated decision was made.

The challenge from Washington to use force could have been declined, so as to rest South Carolina's case on the legal construction of a contract duly signed by the other States wherein all had agreed to South Carolina's reserved right to withdraw from the compact.

THE VIRGINIA POSITION

In previous discussions in our editorial column, the Pioche Record has commented on the work done to evolve plans for action. The essential matter is to assert the superior governmental position of the State, as against the inferior position of the Federal Government, which entirely lacks all governmental powers except by assignment from the States of certain definitely defined and strictly limited powers. It is generally considered that to yield on this matter of principle would be fatal to our constitutional form of government.

It is the position of the States that these limits fixed by the Constitution, have been exceeded in the rulings of the Federal courts in the school cases. Chief Justice Marshall is authority (if authority is needed) for the proposition that a decree of the Supreme Court, where its action is beyond its authority, is void. But the Executive in sending in Armed Forces, to enforce such an order raises the question of what action should be taken by the State in these unusual circumstances. First, it is necessary that the unauthorized nature of the Court's ruling is not merely the opinion of men, but is the ruling of the government of the objecting State.

In the present case the report of the Virginia Commission on Constitutional Government points to a correct legal position and the State could occupy it. The report is a clear analysis and statement of the law. But this commission has not constitutional authority to speak for the State, and this must be borne in mind. The commission was empowered to make a study and report to the legislature but as yet the legislature has not taken proper action as indicated in the report. It is merely a first step. It lacks the constitutional power to speak just as the Supreme Court is lacking in constitutional power in what it has decided and decreed. However, the invalid order of the Supreme Court remains in effect until the legislature acts as there is no other authority under our law that can take this step except the State Government acting through its legislature.

But based on the same legal grounds, as so well analyzed in this commission's report, the State legislature is entirely competent as the lawmaking body, to declare as a matter of law, that the Brown case decision is beyond the constitutional authority of the Supreme Court and to declare it to be null, void, and of no effect, and not the law within the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia.

NOT A VALID LAW BUT AN INVALID ASSUMPTION OF POWER

This could be placed on the basis that the Court's order is legislative and not judicial, one of the points clearly stated in the report; or it could be placed on the basis that "equal protection of the law" is language that cannot be stretched so far as to imply the meaning of "equal education and social opportunities"—a moral and administrative impossibility. Also it conflicts with the strict interpretation of language required by the law in such a case.

The Supreme Court has gone far beyond this strict construction of language, which the law requires in this case. Even the prior decision of 1896 as a matter of legal construction went too far. The obvious intent expressed by the language was exceeded. That decision need not be considered now, except as far as the commission has used it, to show it to be a legislative act to change, after 50 years, the established law under the prior decision. Enlarging the intent carried by the language used, after 50 years, is clearly legislative in its essence, but to extend the meaning any further than the "separate but equal" decision which has been carried out for 50 years, is a usurpation of power that calls for a halt or else there will, from now on, be no limit to what powers the Court may assume.

First let us consider this question: Where Virginia has a law being put into effect and a group of men try to forcibly obstruct the law, what government but Virginia can protect the enforcement of its law? And if the opposition to this law enforcement asserts the authority of another government, who else but Virginia can inquire into, and determine, the validity of this claimed foreign authority?

If the Virginia Legislature declared the action of the Federal courts, under the Brown case decision, void as lacking a constitutional foundation, what higher law is available? The Supreme Court certainly cannot properly be the arbiter of a question involving the limits of its own powers or its own actions, even if such a power had been given it, which it most certainly has not.

THE QUESTION OF EXECUTIVE INTERVENTION

The President has been given no authority either to pass on the constitutional validity of the Court's orders or to obstruct the enforcement by Virginia of its laws. And most assuredly an unconstitutional order of a Federal court does not increase his authority.

If Virginia officially declared the Court's decision to be unconstitutional and void within that State's jurisdiction, and the President has been given no constitutional power to decide the question, then as far as the jurisdiction of Virginia is concerned when agents of the President enter the State they are subject to its law.

The President's oath requires him to uphold the Constitution, not the Supreme Court. Where is there any power given to the Federal Government, under the Constitution, in the enforcement of its laws to override the State, or to prevent the State, in this case, from acting under its powers expressly reserved under the Constitution for just such an emergency? Or to inhibit the States in any other action except what is specifically assigned to the agency Government under a strict, not liberal, construction of the meaning of the language used and intended? The answer is very clear. There is no such power accorded to any branch of the agency Government.

UNAUTHORIZED AND ILLEGAL TYRANNICAL POWERS

Next let us take this question: Assuming that the Court is guilty of a brazen assumption of authority in an offensive use of tyrannical power greater than George III ever used, which may be considered by some a description which fits this case, is it to be assumed there is no remedy? If there is, what protection other than this is given to the State?

Is it to be assumed that the far-seeing, astute framers of this plan for an agency Government with rigidly limited authority, have neglected to provide protection from what the Revolutionary War was fought to remedy? Are we to assume that within the scrupulously guarded plan to prevent the agency Government from becoming tyrannical and oppressive, there was no intent that the reserved-power-provision could be used to protect the event where the Supreme Court would run amuck?

This Court is composed of political appointees, with life tenure in office. It is the one agency of the Government the more easily and completely to be taken into radical hands, which might use its powers as some have asserted it now intends to do, to destroy the very safeguards the founders of this agency Government were seeking to establish. Is it to be assumed that the framers of, and the signatory nations to, our Constitution were asleep on this crucial point of danger?

Is it logical under the Constitution for the Virginia Legislature as the lawmaking power of the State, to declare the orders of the Court ultra vires if such is the fact and that it is not valid within the jurisdiction of the State? Such declaratory action of the legislature must be within the framework of the powers specifically reserved, since such procedure is the only constitutional power available when it may become necessary to curb a tyrannical, arbitrary, and oppressive assertion of an entirely unauthorized, assumption of power, on the part of the Supreme Court. Such a contingency must have been foreseen and who else but the State is in a position to curb the unauthorized power of the Court, when it reaches into the jurisdiction of the particular State whose rights are affected?

In such a situation what is the position of the U.S. Government? The three departments of the created Federal agency, are made equal and independent. Each is deprived of the required power over the other. The States are therefore left as the only power to correct such abuses and the States as governments are given full power under the reserved powers provision. The United States Congress has been given no such authority. The President has been given no such power while on the other hand the States have reserved all powers not specifically granted.

PROTECTION IS PROVIDED IN A BLANKET PROVISION

In drafting the Constitution the arrangement and limitations of powers are so manifestly intended to assuredly, and without any question, prevent governmental tyranny, and the intent is so evident to assure the freedom of the signatory States from any such usurped powers, there must be intended to give a means of protection. In such a state of affairs it is heartsickening to read of what is being endured by the schoolchildren in many of our States under the makeshift, improvised arrangements for the closing of their schools, while they submit to their State being prevented from carrying out its own laws, as directed by its own State constitution. Taxpayers have provided the money, other extensive provisions have been made, instructors are under contract and all is chaos because of the invalid order of a Court and the failure of the State to take the legal position provided for it under the Constitution.

If the State, through its legislative powers formally approves and adopts the conclusion of law already reached by the Virginia Commission on Constitutional Government, that makes it the law of the State. It then becomes a lawful act of the legislature, that this Supreme Court ruling is not based on constitutional authority, that it is ultra vires, and for that reason is declared to be not valid and therefore not the law within this jurisdiction of the State. It is open to the State to take that step. The State can declare what is the law in the State and what is not the law as long as what they declare is not in conflict with the Constitution.

If the State does this without transgressing the powers it has conceded to the Central Government under and by virtue of the Constitution, its position is unassailable. Then let it become the Federal Government's next move.

A LIMITED FEDERAL POWER MUST HONOR ITS LEGAL LIMITS

It is to be assumed it will not move lawlessly or so as to interfere with the enforcement of Virginia laws after what is the law within the State has been made definite. One lawful course would be to convince the Virginia Legislature that the Brown case decision conformed to constitutional requirements and is a valid decision. The other would be to amend the Constitution and have it conform to their forced construction and so-called liberal interpretation.

It is not to be assumed that the Executive, acting under his oath of office, will proceed otherwise than by authority which has been given to him under the Constitution and within the required strict construction of the language used and that is therefore binding on the State. And in the State it must recognize that we have there a government of total powers, subject only to its being the source of such authority that was granted, and what authority had been granted, to the Federal Government. These are the considerations which are required of the President under his oath of office, for the violation of which he is subject to impeachment.

MASSIVE RESISTANCE LIQUIDATED

Massive resistance is the name given to an effort made by the State of Virginia to run its own public school system. This so-called massive resistance was a house built upon a foundation of the sands-of-uncertainty. This foundation was washed away by recent decisions of the courts, a result which from the standpoint of law, was inevitable from the beginning.

In the situation which results from uncertainty as to what is now the law, there is in front of the State of Virginia the immediate task of replacing uncertainty with certainty. When the recent, superbly eloquent speech of the Governor of that great State was delivered, there was one outstanding question which stood before him and before the State. That one question was: What is the law?

A SUPREME COURT RULING MAY OR MAY NOT BE THE LAW OF THE LAND

This foundation on which the complicated structure of massive resistance had been built, could not be classed as established law. On the other hand if the decision in the Brown case was a valid and constitutionally authorized decision of the Supreme Court, it was the law. But if the ruling in the Brown case was not a lawful decision but was the unauthorized opinion of members of the Court, who had disregarded constitutional requirements, then it was not a ruling of the Supreme Court and it is not the law.

In the present critical situation the question, whether the Brown ruling was a decision of the Supreme Court, or the unauthorized opinion of nine men, stands out as one question to appropriately occupy a position somewhere within the bounds of the Governor's eloquent and admirable discussion with its stirring appeal to the people of his State. But the question was not there, and it was conspicuous for its absence.

Until the answer to this question is removed from the realm of uncertainty everything relating to the operation of State schools will be clouded with doubt.

The effort to modify the effect of constitutional law by State statutes now must be abandoned. The question of what is constitutional law, in the realm of operating State schools, is automatically given the right-of-way and the answer to that question can and no doubt will be made definite, by States whose laws are being interfered with, among which States Virginia has assumed leadership.

THE VIRGINIA COMMISSION REPORT

The Virginia Legislature has appointed a Commission on Constitutional Government to help resolve this very question, and that appointed commission has made a study of the Brown case decision. It has made its report which finds that the Court's action was "ultra vires" which is to say that the Court exceeded the constitutional limits of its authority. If this is in accord with the facts, then the Brown ruling is invalid. It is not a decision of the Supreme Court. But such a finding must be declared by the government of a member State whose laws are brought in question by the Court's orders.

The government of the State of Virginia has so far taken no action in approval of the conclusion reached in the report of its Commission. But if the government of Virginia, speaking for the State, after a full investigation and study of the facts resolves this question and reaches a conclusion as to whether the Court was acting within its constitutional requirements, then Virginia, as a State, can hand down its verdict of what is and what is not the law in that State, insofar as its laws are affected by the invalid order of the Supreme Court and all orders of Federal courts which are offshoots from this ruling in the Brown case. In this formal way it can be made definite that the men who are members of the Court, when they are not acting within the authority required for its rulings, cannot issue orders that have the effect of law in that State.

OUR CONSTITUTION—IT MUST BE PRESERVED

Many other States besides the South are interested in preserving their heritage of freedom from tyranny, which has been assured to them under the Constitution of the United States, and if it can be preserved and perpetuated.

While these other States are, many of them onlookers in this particular decision, as affecting local school problems, yet they are concerned that their liberty of action in other walks of life, are kept free from the unconstitutional dictatorship of the members of a court when they speak their personal conclusions, outside of the limits of their authority, or when they act beyond the restrictions imposed upon them by the Constitution.

It is of interest to these States that Virginia will now proceed to use its constitutional reserved powers and in line with its deliberate duty, to the end that if it finds the clear fact to be that the Court has acted out of bounds, as has been reported by its Commission on Constitutional Government, that the consequent resulting invalidity of the Court's procedure, will be declared in a way to carry the proper restraint; on the principle that our Constitution must be preserved and only the States have that responsibility and only the States have been given the power, to act to that accomplishment—and on the principle that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

Virginia has contributed more than any other State to establishing our constitutional form of Government and now it falls to the lot of Virginia to take the steps that will save it from those who would destroy it.

WHEN GOVERNMENTS RUN AMUCK

Is appropriate thought being given to this trend in our country today, to break away from restraining influences and run wild on tangent orbits?

The spread of this trend to our teenagers has built up a staggering record of juvenile crime which is but one phase in a general trend.

If governments break their halters of restraint and we find them running wild, can this be considered less seriously especially when such breaking away from the moorings of security is most certainly drifting us into the realm of chaos?

Our notion is new; we have not had training to catch and tame this kind of runaway, but as we review our records we can find that the wise and far-seeing founders of our form of government, have not neglected to provide the way for such an event to be handled. And these same records show that those Founding Fathers have discussed at length, among themselves, the danger of there being unloosed this very destructive force which now must be dealt with.

In his recent address to his legislature the Governor of Virginia helps bring before our view a strange combination of these broken halters.

DISREGARD OF RESTRAINT

In stirring language he has brought down his criticism on one branch of his Virginia government, namely the Supreme Court of the United States—a branch of government constituted by the government of Virginia in agreement with other governments, as an agency for the performance of a definite and limited role, and for that role only. The Governor arraigns the members of this Court so constituted, for breaking the halter which has tied them and strictly limited their power.

He charges them with wrongfully appropriating legislative powers which have not been given to them. While at the same time he himself proceeds to break the halter which ties him to the executive post of his government. He proceeds to appropriate to himself the powers which have been allotted to the legislature of his State.

He goes ahead, and lays down on the line, what course of action his State will take, when the determination of that problem is strictly a matter for the legislative branch of his government to attend to. The Governor himself being limited, as far as his office is concerned, to the equally strict role of recommending to the legislature what in his opinion should be their course of action, and the veto power if he wishes to use it.

LEGISLATIVE ACTION

The legislative branch of the government has already directed its attention to the problem under discussion. They have gone so far as to appoint a Commission on Constitutional Government to chart out an analysis of the law bearing on the situation. This commission has made a report declaring reasons why the Supreme Court's decision should not be recognized as the law in Virginia.

Further proceedings along these lines were held up by certain proposed indirect lines of action which were not properly founded on established law, and for that reason they have been knocked out by decisions of the courts. This leaves an unfortunate but inevitable mass of debris in the wreckage of the plan, but the legislature is thereby given a free hand to go ahead with proceedings, as a follow-up of this report of the Commission on Constitutional Government, and discontinue futile efforts to oppose constitutional law by legislative enactments.

AUTHORITATIVE PROCEDURE

It is the problem of the legislature, not the Governor, to declare what the law is as far as the jurisdiction of Virginia is concerned. It is for the legislature, not the Governor to determine the question as to the invalidity of actions of the members of the Supreme Court, and whether their actions were beyond the powers granted to them as a court, on which question its Commission has already made its report.

It is for the legislature to say what is the effect on Virginia law of any action which has been taken by members of the Supreme Court wherein they have exceeded their constitutional powers and to say what is the law of Virginia where such a question is to be resolved.

If it is assumed as true, or established as a fact, that a ruling of the U.S. Supreme Court is beyond its granted powers, or if it is claimed on high authority that the Court ruling is unconstitutional, you only have as a result a difference of opinion.

The invalid ruling of the Court must stand until a constitutional power speaks, which is closer to the source of authority than the Supreme Court. But if after a proper investigation of the facts such a source of constitutional power finds, and lawfully declares that the order because of lack of authority was not an order of the Court, then in that event the act is merely the order of members of the Court, without constitutional power.

If this should be the government of a member State which takes such action then, within the jurisdiction of that State, the higher legal authority is the government of the State and it is the final arbiter of what is the law in that State. Then the illegal action of the members of the Court become, in that jurisdiction a nullity. But the Governor of a State is not the government of that State. What he declares to be the effect of the Court's ruling is merely his personal opinion.

[From the Pioche (Nev.) Record, Apr. 9, 1959]

THE CONSTITUTION AND A STRANGE PERPLEXITY

The Virginia Assembly will meet in what some consider to be the most critical moment in the history of that State. If the Constitution is to be altered from now on, without the consent of the people, it is also of concern to all of the States.

The meeting stands as if it were at the pass of Thermopylae. It is standing alone, disputing the progressive movement of what the Governor of that State has classed as "a conspiracy to destroy the Constitution of the United States." And this movement must be stopped at this point or the flood gates will be opened.

The question that is now before the Virginia Assembly, reduced to definite terms may be thus stated:

(a) Is the ruling in the Brown case a valid ruling of the Supreme Court or is it an unauthorized assumption of authority on the part of the members of the Court?

(b) If the Virginia Government finds the fact to be as stated in its Commission on Constitutional Government's report, that the Court was not acting within the bounds of its authority, and that the Constitution did not grant to the Supreme Court the authority assumed by its members, in their decision in the Brown Case, what is the law in such a situation?

(c) If the Government of Virginia, by law duly enacted, in proper form, declares the ruling in the Brown case not constitutionally authorized, and not a lawful act of the Supreme Court, and for that reason not the law within the jurisdiction of the Government of Virginia, what authority has been conferred upon the Supreme Court to override this action of the Virginia Government?

(d) What is the importance of intent in construing the meaning of the Constitution? Is it the law that the intent, of the parties who drafted and parties who approved the language used, must govern its construction, and is the Supreme Court bound by this law? Did the Supreme Court follow that law in the Brown decision?

(e) Did the States who are parties to the Constitution, intend to give to the Court, under any assumed pretext, the power to regulate their schools or to make rulings that have the effect of laws, which if submitted to their legislatures, could not gain the approval of the representatives of the people, or did the states give the Court power to otherwise negate the principle, established by the American Revolution, that governments derive their powers to govern from the consent of those governed?

These questions comprise the matters that must be handled. But in front of these questions there is another matter for solution. Who is to unscramble the eggs? A hopeless confusion arises from mixing two problems together which first must be separated in order for either to be solved.

THE CART BEFORE THE HORSE

It has been overlooked, due to its emotional element, that the question, whether it is good or bad to enforce segregated schools upon an unwilling people is not the primary issue. The issue of who is to decide the question comes first. It is not a question at this stage, how the schools are to be managed. The first question is who will do the managing. If the State authorities are managing the schools and at the same time the Federal authorities are managing the schools, we have a hopeless entanglement. Let the gentleman who has come up and taken the front seat be ushered back to the seat to which his ticket entitles him, and we can handle the matter. In that simile the gentleman taking the wrong seat is an employee, or any department of the Federal Government, the master who issued the ticket being the State, and the usher being the legislature. The immediate question being the examination of the ticket, the legislature has already taken preliminary action, in the report of its commission, but then the matter was dropped to experiment with State authority and Federal authority both at the same time, trying to do the same thing; namely, to dictate as to the management of the schools, and both have been acting unlawfully with resulting entanglements and confusion.

According to the report of its duly appointed Commission on Constitutional Government there is no valid decision of the Supreme Court on this subject, for the reason that constitutional authority was lacking. Its rulings were ultra vires. If this is the law, the Supreme Court is not entitled to the position it has assumed.

If this can be followed up by lawful proceedings, and the government of Virginia can confirm the conclusion of its Commission on Constitutional Government, and after a full investigation of the facts declare the ruling in the Brown case to be unconstitutional, and not valid, then in that State at least there can, from then on, be no confusion, as to what is the law affecting the operation of its schools. What the Court attempts to do, beyond its rights under the Constitution, is invalid. That is the law, but it must be made definite what is the status of the matter, by proper action of a source from which the authority of the Supreme Court was originally derived.

WHAT IS THE CONSTITUTION

One unfortunate element in correcting this situation is that the people of the country are confused in their understanding. They have been misled by the information generally current as to the powers of the Federal Government. What we have to deal with is not a question of State rights so much as a question of what are the limitations to Federal power. The State rights are unlimited excepting those it has surrendered. The Federal Government has no rights at all except those that have been given to it.

It is a question of making a study of the Constitution. What is the Constitution? Who constituted it, for what purpose, and what are the ends to be achieved? Who is made the boss? Let us take a closeup look at what is the Constitution of the United States.

The Constitution is a written agreement, among separate and independent nations to whom that status was given, some years before, under the terms of the treaty of peace at the end of the Revolutionary War. In order to consolidate some of the burden of government they agreed on a plan to appoint an agency Government.

By a treaty arrangement they thus constituted three separate agencies, each being made independent of the other, and to each is granted a limited authority to perform a certain well-defined part of their national functions, no more and no less. All authority not specifically granted was specifically reserved.

Also employees of the agency Government were to be required to take an oath of office to protect and defend this agreement which defines and limits their powers, with the hope that it would not be necessary to use the reserved powers in order to gain the intended protection. But before signing the agreement, at the insistence of the State of Virginia, they made sure that there could be no uncertainty as to the intent, that all powers not granted were reserved to the parties to the agreement.

It is the present use of this reservation which is now a matter for the attention of the assembled representatives of the people of the State, and it is particularly concerned with the point that the Supreme Court has no authority beyond what the State of Virginia has intended to give it. All the authority and all the power the Supreme Court can claim to exercise, must as a matter of law, be clearly stated in papers signed by the State of Virginia, and it is the law that the papers can only carry the powers intended at the time. While Virginia has acted in agreement with other governments in giving the authority granted, that does not change or enlarge the authority.

THE PEOPLE SPEAK

The State's leaders must assume the responsibility for this simple and necessary question being so mixed up as to become almost hopelessly confused, and this confusion must now be cleared up if this meeting of the assembly is to measure up to the requirements of the people.

The recent unprecedented meeting on the Richmond Capitol grounds of nearly 8,000 orderly but seriously intending citizens, volunteering to come from all parts of the State, with a designated spokesman to express their views, left no doubt of the seriousness of their intent that governments must obey the law.

The legislature will have before it two reports. The report of its especially delegated Commission on Constitutional Government which report declares the U.S. Supreme Court in the case of Brown v. The School Board was out of constitutional bounds in its proceedings and consequently its ruling was ultra vires.

The assembly will also have a report of another commission selected by the Governor of that State. The Governor has taken the position of dealing with and acceding to this same ruling of the Supreme Court which the Commission on Constitutional Government has reported to be illegal. The people of the State have most positively refused to be governed by it and if the presently assembled government agrees with the Commission on Constitutional Government and declares the Court's ruling to be not constitutionally founded and therefore not the law within the jurisdiction, then in that case the proceedings proposed by the Governor will not be necessary. The matters will be otherwise taken care of.

While the commission appointed by the assembly has given its reasons why this ruling is beyond the Court's constitutional authority and therefore void, yet this does not preclude further investigation by the assembly before adopting the report. A thorough overhauling of this entire matter, by so dignified a body as the Virginia Legislature, would be a milestone in the progress in developing the American form of Government.

CONSPIRACY TO DESTROY THE CONSTITUTION

The Governor has said that his State is "battered by the unholy alliance of a conspiracy to destroy the Constitution." And yet he proposes new legislation which in effect assents to the validity of this same ruling and in a measure gives effect to it. In reference to this same ruling of the Supreme Court the Governor has said, "I saw the Court ignore the Constitution, cast aside all precedents, Federal and State, and judicially legislate the ideology of a foreign socialist into the Constitution."

In this amazing discord and confusion it is most fortunate that one thing stands out with clarity, and that is the law which has already been established and which must guide the legislature and afford a foundation for its action. The law is the controlling factor in this critical affair, critical to their State, critical to what in the Governor's charge is a "conspiracy to destroy the Constitution," and of course of concern to all of the States which wish to see the Supreme Court deterred from roaming in the green pastures of usurped autocratic power. The law is what will govern if the law is applied.

APPLICATION OF THE LAW TO QUESTIONS UNDER CONSIDERATION

Quoting Chief Justice John Marshall in the leading and often quoted case of Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 179:

"It is apparent that the framers of the Constitution contemplated that instrument as a rule for the government of courts as well as the legislature. * * * A law repugnant to the Constitution is void, and the courts as well as other departments are bound by that instrument."

Alexander Hamilton was one of the leaders among the founders of the Constitution. In Federalist Paper No. 33, he affords highest authority on the question of what was the intent of the framers of the Constitution on this point. Mr. Hamilton says: things that are done in "violation of constitutionally defined authority will be merely acts of usurpation, and will be deserved to be treated as such."

These two authorities alone would outweigh the basis for the Court's decision in the Brown case which mainly hinged on its reference in footnote 11 to its opinion. The authority there cited is a patently superficial foreign writer on social theories. It has nothing to say about the issue before the Court which is to interpret the intended meaning of the 14th amendment.

SUPREME COURT'S CITED AUTHORITY

The author, who is cited as authority to back up the decision of the Court, has this to say about the Constitution: "The American Constitution is in many respects impractical and ill suited for modern conditions." If the author can convince the Court of the correctness of his conclusion, which would mean that the Constitution should be abandoned in favor of a Communist regime from which it is our main defense, the Court could recommend amendments to the Constitution, but hardly change it to suit the author, without the approval of the people, or hand down a decision to that effect.

The Virginia government is justified in rejecting the Court's conclusion as the law for interpreting the Constitution, as far as it is based on footnote 11 in its decision. On the other hand the State is justified in ruling that Chief Justice Marshall and Alexander Hamilton are better authorities for determining what was the intent of that document and how the authority of the Court is limited in construing it.

It would be helpful to the legislature if the attorneys would furnish, for their consideration, extracts from the Court's rulings which would give a legal basis for changing the interpretation of the language "separate but equal," in the 1896 opinion of the Court to conform with the views of the writers quoted, who express disapproval of the Constitution as the basic law.

This would give the assembly a better opportunity for an analysis of authorities on which the decision was based, and disclose its bearing on the proceedings of the Court, being within the authority conferred upon it, by the Constitution.

THE LEGAL EFFECT OF INTENT

What is the legal effect if the Court, in reaching its decision, has flagrantly ignored and made no effort to determine the intent of the signatory parties, at the time of their agreeing to the Constitution or its amendments. What is the importance of "intent" as a matter of law?

The law on this question is very clearly expressed in the U.S. Supreme Court's decision reported in (199 U.S. 488): "The Constitution is a written instrument. As such its meaning does not alter. That which it meant when adopted it means now. * * * Those things which are within its grants of power, as those grants were understood when made, are still within them, those things not within them remain still excluded."

Quoting from the decision of Chief Justice John Marshall in Gibson v. Ogden, 9 Wheat 199:

"As men whose intentions require no concealment, generally employ the words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who framed our Constitution, and the people who adopted it, must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they have said."

THE PROBLEM BRIEFLY STATED

Divested of all its trappings, the situation in hand can be thus plainly stated:

(a) The Supreme Court has no power except what the State of Virginia intended to confer upon it.

(b) The State of Virginia has never intended to give the power to the Supreme Court to regulate its schools.

(c) The Supreme Court by a forced construction of words cannot override the principle of local self-government and home rule for which the Revolutionary War was fought and won.

(d) It must be kept in mind that the State of Virginia created the Supreme Court and limited its authority, requiring an oath of office that insures its integrity. Any act of the Court, in excess of authority authorized, is of necessity unauthorized and void, and the source from which the authority is given must be also the ultimate judge of its performance. Otherwise it is not a rule of law that has been established, but a rule of men—not a republic but an oligarchy.

THREAT OF FORCE

The Governor of Virginia takes the position that he cannot overthrow or negate "the overriding power of the Federal Government."

This statement overlooks that the Federal Government must be given the authority, before it can make use of any power. No power can be used to oppose the State in any matter where the Federal Government lacks constitutional authority. What the Federal Government bases its rights on, when it attempts to coerce the State, must be within the clear provisions of the Constitution as intended by the signatory parties at the time.

It is not a question of the overriding power of the Federal Government, rather it is a question of what is the right of the Federal Government, and whether the State has ever conceded that right. The power question beclouds the present issue. The power of the Federal Government is entirely irrelevant to the problem under consideration. It is a question of the right of the Supreme Court not the power of the Government.

The founders of our Government have had their work brushed aside if power is substituted for right, and when the rule of men is substituted for the rule of law, it falls to our lot to see that this is not done. The military might that has been allowed the Federal Government has no use or application here. The task is rather that of defining and making sure what is the law, and using the powers reserved to the States so that the law may be so defined as to require its being given due respect by all agencies of the law. Had the Legislature of Arkansas, with the Governor's approval, invalidated the Federal ruling as not the law in that State, the Executive would not have had constitutional authority to defy the law of Arkansas by sending in troops.

This question may be asked, after the State government has made definite by the required proceedings, what is the law within its jurisdiction, what authority does the Constitution confer upon the executive department of the Federal Government to obstruct the lawful functions of the State? Under what provision of the Constitution would the executive department be acting if it interfered with the State in the enforcement of its laws?

Unless the Constitution has been abandoned, any department of the Federal Government dealing with the State could be required to answer this question.

[From the Pioche (Nev.) Record, Apr. 23, 1959]

QUO VADIS, VIRGINIA?

With the Virginia Legislature in session the news has presented the silent aspect. It is claimed the main issue of the Revolutionary War is at stake, but throughout the Nation who knows what has been going on in Richmond?

The Governor of the State just before calling this special session of his legislators, in a special nationwide TV address, gave his listeners to understand that there was a serious question of constitutional law which needed the attention of his lawmakers.

He advanced very good reasons, and advanced them with force and eloquence, why the ruling of the Supreme Court which had closed the schools of his State, entrained a tyrannical usurpation of power, and had overreached its constitutional limits of authority.

Because of the grave nature of this change and far-reaching principles involved, he announced that in such a situation there could be no compromise.

When the legislature assembled there was another address by the Governor. In it he said:

"I am not aware of any crisis in the history of Virginia more grave nor any emergency creating a more impelling necessity for the convening of the representatives of our people.

"Encompassed by the iron will of arrogated power, buffeted upon the storms of an uneven contest, pierced with the daggers of political expediency and battered by the unholy alliance of a conspiracy to destroy the Constitution, Virginia, true to the faith of the Founding Fathers' heritage, must never recede in this struggle to preserve her rights nor suffer her voice to be stifled in the councils of the Nation."

It may be there are some in our American citizenry who are not particularly interested in preserving the liberty of person and property that once was assured by their Constitution. For them we would not speak. But for those of us who feel that these once assured rights to freedom, have been whittled away, and wish to see that what is left is preserved, the result of the proceedings in Richmond are of real concern. They will direct our future.

A CHANGE OF FRONT

The Virginia Assembly has met as scheduled. But from the daily national press the public would not gather that, within their range of the news, a grave constitutional crisis was there being dealt with.

The Governor himself selected a group from the assembly members, as his working staff. Why his legislature is not left to select their own commission does not appear. But the procedure is being directed by the Governor. The matters selected by his leadership are to be given short shrift and rushed through. Time has become the important element, as it was in Washington in 1933–34 when the Constitution was forgotten, foreign commerce destroyed, the groundwork was laid for our now present imponderable national debt and the destruction of our wealth-producing industries.

The defense of the people from the transgressions upon their right of self-government, so eloquently promised on January 20th, suddenly is shifted over and the subject is to be shunned. In their place questions will have consideration such as the means for transporting what children to what schools; tuition grants to children who might prefer not to attend schools provided by law; whether they are to be paid by the State or by the localities; modification of statutes providing for liens on buildings; many complicated and strongly contested details of school administration. All is based on the assumption that there is to be a surrender without the public knowledge. No time being given for debate or discussion on the matter of principle, or whether constitutional limits have been disregarded by the courts or whether their proceedings have the validity of law. Darkness still prevails on the question, What is the law?

THE QUESTION AND THE ANSWER

In his address on opening the assembly meeting the Governor said:

"I saw the Court ignore the Constitution, cast aside all precedents, Federal and State and judicially legislate the ideology of a foreign Socialist into the Constitution, outside of the record, with no opportunity for a hearing or cross-examination."

He also said: "If any of them know the way through the dark maze of judicial aberration and constitutional exploitation, I call upon them to shed the light for which Virginia stands in dire need in this, her dark and agonizing hour. No fair-minded person would be so unreasonable as to seek to hold me responsible for failure to exercise powers which the State is powerless to bestow."

In answer to this, if it had been permitted for the proceedings to provide for it, members of the Virginia Commission for Constitutional Government could have proposed the answer to this question by a resolution giving effect to the findings of the previously appointed commission of the legislature. The simple answer is a resolution declaring the ruling of the Supreme Court not within its constitutional authority and therefore void and not the law within the jurisdiction of the State, which action by the legislature, when approved by the Governor would have ended all doubt as to what was the law in Virginia on the school question.

But in the present stage of the proceedings, no reverberations have come through of any debates on the question of the Court's constitutional powers or the tyranny of the orders of the Court. No Patrick Henry has revived the "give me liberty or give me death," memories. Instead we see the planned details of what appears to be the arrangements of a surrender.

When the Governor's program was rushed to completion and ready to be sent to the proper committee, it appeared that sure defeat was awaiting it by that route. The committee was then bypassed. The vote of the senate as a committee of the whole was used, as a strategy move, to save its defeat. A most unique, in fact an unprecedented move to override the will of the people's established organization.

The people wish the constitutional question met and disposed of. The Governor and his followers, in an attitude of defiance, suddenly switched the plan of action to what would accord with the Supreme Court being given the right of usurpation which once they so eloquently condemned.

In exchange they gain the planning of such matters as the handling of tuition grants and a number of kindred questions, all of them based on conceding to the Court the right to invade areas of power, which heretofore have been strictly denied them, and which would pave the way to changing over from a Government of the people to a new form of autocratic dictatorship.

AN OUTSTANDING EVENT

Despite the scarcity of space given these events in the metropolitan press an incident in the history of our Nation, known to those present, throws considerable light on what is going on in this Virginia constitutional crisis. On March 31 there appeared in the capitol grounds at Richmond a voluntary crusade of thousands of citizens from all parts of the State. More than 5,000 citizens assembled, with an orderly but determined purpose, to speak with the Governor of the State and with the members of the legislature, in a face-to-face assembly.

The Governor did not appear. He had other appointments. But the members of the assembly seated on the front steps of the capitol building heard what the citizenry had to say speaking to them through their well-selected spokesman.

In this extraordinary if not unprecedented procedure, these representatives of the people of the State, presented with extreme courtesy, their plainly-put demand, that the constitutional rights of the people must be defended and not surrendered. At the same time they reminded the legislators that they were speaking for the people to their elected representatives.

The speaker, Mr. Edward J. Silverman of Blackstone, Va., after a graceful introduction by the chairman of the newly organized "Bill of Rights Crusade," sponsored by the Virginia Committee for Constitutional Government, and after a short but impressive opening prayer, proceeded to address himself to the absent Governor and to the members of the assembled Virginia Legislature.

THE PEOPLE SPEAK

With dignity and directness the Governor and the legislators were brought to a realization of the serious nature of the occasion.

Speaking of the Governor, he said:

"He is a great orator. He is a great citizen of Virginia. He has been honored many times by his fellow Virginians. But his voice no longer rings out against Federal tyranny, and it appears that he wishes this legislative body to surrender and submit to the ruthless might of Washington.

"Virginians have always loved their Governors. Rare is it that a Virginia Governor has had to face such a demonstration as this—demonstration by the people who elected him because they feel now he has surrendered his State. Is not this crusade the proof needed that the people of Virginia still run their government?"

Speaking to the legislators, he said:

"And so, we are now turning to you, the elected representatives to the legislative branch of our government. You are our only remaining line of defense.

"We appeal to you to give us the leadership and statesmanship necessary to lead us through this dark crisis and to make the long, hard sacrifices necessary to preserve our liberties and the sovereignty of our Commonwealth.

"We do not believe that Virginia, in this grave hour, is without that statesmanship which has brought her through the trials of the centuries.

"You must snatch up the torch of liberty from where the executive branch has let it fall. The eyes of Virginia and the Nation are upon you.

"The question has been asked by certain Virginia officials as to how the sovereignty of the State can be interposed, in that we cannot meet the physical force of the Federal Government with like physical force. We must rely upon the dauntless spirits of Virginia leadership to passively resist every judicial abuse of the Federal Government."

Speaking of the school issue, he said:

"But the school issue is only a springboard being used by those who would destroy States rights. While important, it, in itself, is insignificant to the events which may come tomorrow or next week.

"The acceptance and submission of Virginia to this principle, that the nine Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States may thus destroy the Constitution, designed by our forefathers as the bulwark of liberty for all generations of America, is the acceptance of tyranny and a betrayal of the historic destiny and tradition of Virginia as the creator and preserver of American liberty."

In this dramatic performance the legislators were in the saddle, but next November the voters will hold the position of power.

It will be the wish of all lovers of freedom that, by then, through diligent attention to their task, they will have moved into a position to effectively use it.

[From the Pioche (Nev.) Record, July 2, 1959]

OUR CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS: CAN THE PEOPLE DEFEND THEM?

A far-reaching issue is being molded in the State of Virginia for the approaching election. This question is whether the people of the United States will govern themselves or whether the scepter of government can be passed out of their hands. Virginia stands once again, in its historic position. It will guard the rights of the people of all the Nation or it will fail. The decrees of fate have set the issue to find its solution in Virginia.

Such an issue is of vital concern to all the people. But there is a prevailing silence, and even in Virginia the critical issue of "a rule of the people" is buried in emotional discussions.

There are two political action groups which have been developed in Virginia. One of these, headed by its political leaders, represents what is charged by their critics to be a masterpiece in betrayal and duplicity. It is charged that while proclaiming with words and promises that they will uphold the rights of the people against usurpation of assumed Federal authority, and while heaping inordinate abuse upon the members of the Court (who may be in entire good faith even if acting under a mistaken guidance), they proceed to adopt as the law, and apply to their State, the very illegal rulings they so strongly condemn.

In their criticism of the Court they make use of the same words that could be used to proclaim the Court's acts of usurpation to be illegal. And they neglect the legal means that has been provided, through the constitutionally reserved powers, which could be used to accomplish the fulfillment of their political promises, or at the very least such an effort could be debated.

Those who have been elected on the strength of their repeated assurances, that they would never yield to the unlawful usurpation in question, have hastened to yield, at the last special session of the legislature. This they did without time being given to debate the issues. Their only grounds given for this reversal, is their fear of Federal power—thus proclaiming to the world another declaration in error, that America is ruled by force and not by law.

THE POINT OF DIFFERENCE

The second group agrees that the Supreme Court ruling is unconstitutional, on the ground that it stands for the usurpation of a power which is denied to it. And therefore it is an ultra vires act. This second group contends that the ruling being illegal, it should be treated to that effect as a matter of law. It is usurpation and should be treated as such.

They would give effect to the language of Alexander Hamilton when he said: "Violation of constitutionally defined authority will be merely acts of usurpation, and will be deserved to be treated as such."

They would adopt the Supreme Court ruling handed down by Chief Justice John Marshall: "A law repugnant to the Constitution is void, and the courts as well as other departments are bound by that instrument."

This second Virginia group might well select a name better fitted to their belief in the law and to their determination to suppress lawlessness. However they have been branded with the unfortunate label of "Massive resistance."

This implication of resistance is a misfit. There is no remedy by the route of resistance to what is legally unauthorized. It calls for being put in cold storage. It is legally dead and needs to be buried in due form.

Powers not granted are reserved to the States. The States must use their reserved powers when it becomes necessary to protect their laws from acts of tyranny or usurpation of authority, especially where the State is the source of the authority being illegally assumed.

The invalid action of employees of any department or division of the Federal Government calls for its formal invalidation. Its lack of legal effect must be determined by proper authority. It cannot be determined by third party onlookers.

In the language of Chief Justice Marshall, any action of the departments of the Federal Government beyond the authority allotted to it is void. And this, he says, applies to the courts as well as to other offices created by the Constitution. This is the law. But it needs to be applied to the given situation.

THE QUESTION ANALYZED

If it is a fact that the decision in the Brown case is unconstitutional, as beyond the power granted to the Court under the Constitution, or if it is ultra vires to use the language of the report of the Virginia Commission on Constitutional Government, then it is void. The fact in this statement, is agreed to by all parties as applied in the Virginia situation. And what is the law, is a matter that has been decided by the Supreme Court.

If this is so found by a signatory State, one which has granted to the Supreme Court its powers, then the situation is not one which calls for resistance—it calls for an undoing of something that has been wrongfully done. It calls for such action as to make legally definite and beyond personal opinion, or debate, the fact that the unlawful act will not be recognized as a lawful act. Then as a matter of law the act becomes void and of no effect and there is no authority given anywhere under the Constitution that can contradict it. It stands as an exercise of an authority that has been reserved because it has not been otherwise granted.

The President is required to take an oath before he can qualify for the duties of his office that he will preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States.

Not so with members of the Supreme Court. It is required that they shall be bound by an oath to support this Constitution.

They, and all empolyees whose office is constituted by the agreement, are that firmly bound or tied in, as only an oath can bind them to the Constitution. None of their acts which are not a part of their constitutionally conferred authority can be an act of government and necessarily are void, as far as it concerns the Government.

A FIXED LEGAL POSITION

Any decision based on the authority quoted in the Brown case ruling in its footnote 11, to the effect that the Constitution is outmoded and not adapted to modern conditions, is out of the bounds fixed, and cannot be classed as an authorized act of the Court.

It would seem that the founders of our form of government have done their part to defend coming generations, and free them from the oppressions of that tyrannical rule it had cost them so much to throw off. Are we to admit we are unable to accomplish their clearly intended objective, with the means they have provided to that end?

But the founders of this constitutionally limited Government have done more than require an oath to assure that Government agencies will stay put within the limits set. Among other protecting safeguards, they made the Federal agencies legally the employees of the States; that the signatory States constituted the positions that were to be filled by the employees of the agencies created and neither the agencies nor the employees are made parties to the agreement.

Their legal position is strictly one of a limited agency or employee. To demand the salaries due them is their only implied legal right, and all rights not given them being reserved to the States completes the work of the Founding Fathers to assure to the States the right of action against tyranny in the form of usurpation of powers by these employees or agencies.

THE SHOWDOWN

Since this Government was founded there has never been permitted to bring to a showdown such a clear-cut issue of whether the people of the Nation must consent to be ruled by an autocratic, unlawful, usurpation of tyrannical authority, against which the Constitution of the United States is designed and intended to furnish the most definite and complete protection.

Usurpation was the one great fear of the founders of our form of government. They considered its danger and did not end their labors without carefully laying down in principle the way to handle such unlawful actions.

For any politically strong group of men to be allowed to grasp autocratic powers through usurpation of authority is to submit to a complete overthrow of rule by the people. Such procedure is a side-door entrance to a Russian form of government, also established by usurpation, backed by lawless force, an autocratic dictatorship, which by the strangest paradox in history was firmly established as a world power by the wealth and manpower of the United States.

After more than 50 years of gradual encroachment upon individual rights by a slow, invisible movement, a kind of creeping paralysis, at last there is a showdown in the issue as now set up in the State of Virginia—the highly organized political force of the invisible hand against untutored, unorganized but firm will of the people to resist encroachment on their rights of self-government.

Before the people lies the role to elect representatives who will favor a law wherein the government of Virginia proclaims that the school-case ruling is beyond the range of power conferred upon the Court under the Constitution, and, therefore, is invalid and void and not the law in that State.

ON THE FIXING OF BOUNDARY LINES—A STATEMENT BY THE VIRGINIA COMMISSION ON CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT, SEPTEMBER 9, 1958

The human conflicts present in the controversy over the South's public schools are real, are complex, and cannot be minimized. Yet the public attention concentrated upon these social problems unfortunately has obscured a towering question of constitutional government, and this question transcends the immediate and personal issues of particular children in particular schools. It is in the hope of encouraging consideration of a basic concept of the American Republic that this commission, created by the General Assembly of Virginia in 1958, offers this statement.

This basic concept cannot be understood without some recognition of unalterable facts of history and long-established principles of law. Our Union is a union of States. That is what it was in the beginning and that is what it remains today. In this Union, all power to govern flows from the people in their States. Some powers the people have delegated, under the Constitution, to Federal authority; all other powers they have reserved, under the Constitution, to themselves.

WE ARE NOT THE SAME

There are sound reasons for this. The States are not all the same; their economies, societies, interests, resources, are not all the same; customs and traditions vary enormously from State to State, and laws that might be wise and useful in one area may be demonstrably needless or even harmful in another. This diversity is part of the strength of the Union. It has been recognized as such from the very beginnings of our history, and the underlying theory of the Constitution is that the States are left free to govern themselves, subject only to the prohibitions they have expressly imposed upon themselves by the Constitution.

The States manifest their individual powers in many different ways. Each State, for example, fixes a minimum age at which its citizens may vote; and though some may believe it unwise to permit 18-year-olds to vote, nothing in the Constitution prohibits a State from thus extending its franchise. Similarly, many persons may doubt the soundness of a State law providing for rent control, but a State may adopt such a law if its people choose. Two States, Oklahoma and Mississippi, regard traffic in intoxicating liquors as immoral, and they have prohibited it; but the other 46 States are not compelled to accept this view. Half the States permit parimutuel gambling on horseraces; the other half do not. The point we seek to emphasize is that a practice which many people may regard as unwise, or unsound, or immoral, is not unlawful until it is made so by lawful process. That which some persons conceive to be socially or economically wrong may still be constitutionally right.

THE KEY QUESTION

Acceptance of this plain truth of our Government is vital to any proper understanding of the constitutional issue at stake in the South's public school crisis. The Southern States, or some of them, do not conceive the maintenance of racially separate schools to be morally wrong; on the contrary, they believe this policy to be in the best interests of all their people. That many persons strongly oppose this view is not to be doubted. But the question is not whether the Southern States, in exercising a power to maintain such schools, are acting morally or immorally; the question is whether they are acting constitutionally. Distasteful as the conclusion may be to some critics of the South, the conclusion cannot be escaped that the Southern States are fully within their constitutional rights in the position they have taken.

The conflict here, fundamentally, is one of the rights of the citizen and the powers of a State. Whatever the rights of the individual are, these rights cannot be infringed; correspondingly, whatever the powers of the State may be, these powers may be exercised at the State's discretion. In this controversy, as in countless others, the problem rests in determining the line at which rights end, and powers begin; it is a problem in the fixing of boundaries.

We must look to the 14th amendment to determine where this boundary lies. The 14th amendment, leaving aside all questions of the validity of its adoption, was conceived primarily as a prohibitory amendment: It was intended to prohibit to the States certain powers they had exercised in the past; specifically, the States were prohibited from denying to any citizen the equal protection of the laws. Beyond question, the effect of the amendment also was to vest in the newly freed Negro people certain rights they had not enjoyed before—the rights, for example, to own property, to enter into contracts, and to sue and be sued.

WHAT ADDED?—WHAT SUBTRACTED?

The constitutional issue now before the country, in this context, is simply stated. So far as public schools are concerned, what individual rights were created? What State powers were reduced? If in 1868 certain rights were added to those possessed by the citizen, then in 1868 certain powers must have been subtracted from those held by the States. What did the amendment mean in terms of public schools?

Clearly, the Congress that framed the 14th amendment, and the States that ratified it, never intended for an instance that a guarantee of equal protection of the laws was to affect the operation of separate schools in any way. Long after the amendment was ratified, States both North and South continued to maintain racially separate institutions. It is unthinkable that they understood the amendment to prohibit them from the exercise of powers they were daily exercising.

The correctness of this understanding was confirmed repeatedly by the highest State and Federal courts in an unbroken line of decisions stretching over many years. It was confirmed, also, by the tacit acquiescence of the States themselves: When the doctrine of "separate but equal" was sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1896, not a single State voiced a protest or asserted a misinterpretation of the amendment. And Congress, from the date of the amendment until the date of the school segregation cases, demonstrated its understanding of the amendment by actively maintaining separate schools in the District of Columbia. Thus the boundary line was fixed. By what authority may it now be changed?

THE LAW OF THE CASE

The position of the Southern States today is that the governmental power they exercised constitutionally for so many years—the power to maintain racially separate schools—cannot be prohibited to them by mandate of the Supreme Court. Many persons, it appears, believe that the Court has the right, as well as the power, to impose this prohibition upon the States as an addition to the "law of the land." In actual fact, the Court's mandate is no more than the "law of the case" in which it is handed down; the Court's power is a judicial power, not a legislative power, and it is worth emphasizing that there is now no law and no provision of the Constitution requiring racially integrated schools. Nevertheless, we acknowledge that some observers believe this to be the effect of the Court's opinion in the school cases. For our own part, we hold that in attempting to prohibit to the States the power to operate separate schools, the Court usurped the amendatory power that constitutionally is vested in three-fourths of the States alone.

In effect the Court sought not merely to interpret the Constitution, but substantively to amend the Constitution and this the Court has no authority to do.

The Virginia Commission on Constitutional Government respectfully urges the people of every State to reflect thoughtfully upon these matters. There are two questions involved in this struggle. The only question properly before the Supreme Court of the United States was whether a State's maintenance of separate schools is constitutional. The other question, whether such schools are morally and socially right or wrong, is a question of policy, not of jurisprudence.

It is our prayer that the people of the United States, whatever their views on segregation, will reflect carefully upon the consequences of entrusting the formation of national social policies to a judicial body appointed for life. We cannot believe that our sister States, viewing the matter dispassionately, will fail to perceive the grave danger to all State powers that lies in the Court's drastic action here.

"IT IS NOT FOR THE COURT—"

These apprehensions are not peculiar to the South in 1958; Washington voiced them in his "Farewell Address." Lincoln many times emphasized the same points. More recently, Mr. Justice Black has asserted that it is not for the Supreme Court to roam at large in the broad expanses of policy and morals, and to trespass on the legislative domain of the States. Mr. Justice Douglas has warned that instability is created when a judiciary with life tenure seeks to write its social and economic creed into the Charter. Mr. Justice Frankfurter has declared that, "As a member of this Court, I am not justified in writing my private notions of policy into the Constitution, no matter how deeply I may cherish them or how mischievous I may deem their disregard." The late Chief Justice Vinson emphasized that because the Court must rest its decisions on the Constitution alone, we must set aside predilections on social policy and adhere to the settled rules which restrict the exercise of our power to judicial reivew. Holmes, Hughes, Sutherland, Harlan, Taney, among a host of great jurists, have insisted down through the years on strict adherence to the rule, in Hughes' phrase, that "it is not for the Court to amend the Constitution by judicial decree."

We should like also to direct attention to the words of Elihu Root, recently proclaimed as sound doctrine by the conference of chief justices of the several States:

"If the people of our country yield to impatience which would destroy the system that alone makes effective these great impersonal rules and preserves our constitutional government, rather than to endure the temporary inconvenience of pursuing regulated methods of changing the law, we shall not be reforming. We shall not be making progress, but shall be exhibiting * * * the lack of that self-control which enables great bodies of men to abide the slow process of orderly government rather than to break down the barriers of order when they are struck by the impulse of the moment."

Let us not abandon these wise admonitions in the passions of a turbulent hour.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Memorial to Judge William Lewis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE SILER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 5, 1959

Mr. SILER. Mr. Speaker, even in the rush of these closing days of our 1959 session of the 86th Congress, I would like to take this opportunity to memorialize one of our former Members who served briefly in 1948, Judge William Lewis of London, Ky., and who represented my district in the U.S. Congress during that year and who has now passed out of this mortal life at the age of 90 years at his home in Kentucky, on August 8, 1959, after a lingering illness of several years' duration.

I knew Judge Lewis during the days of his maturity as a lawyer and a judge and as a public figure in southeastern Kentucky. He was always kind, affable, congenial, and courteous. Never did I see him in anger or exhibiting a spirit of vindictiveness toward his fellow man. He was a scholarly man and one of the ablest lawyers down in my part of Kentucky. He understood the mountain people and their homespun philosophy and their humble origin. He himself had the same philosophy and origin, for he came from the humblest of the humble. Although his fill-in term of service was very brief, yet he must have impressed quite a few Members of this body with his native ability and his pleasing personality because several who served with him have inquired about him since I became a Member of Congress.

Judge Lewis' career in public service covered half a century. For 18 years he had been judge of the same circuit—made up of Clay, Laurel, and Jackson Counties.

His son, Ray C. Lewis, London, served later the same district as circuit judge.

On April 24, 1948, he was elected to Congress to serve out the remainder of the term of the late John M. Robsion, Sr. This was in the strongly Republican Ninth District, which is now the Eighth.

The Democratic Party leaders made one attempt to nominate a candidate, but were prevented by a flood from holding a scheduled convention. So only write-in votes opposed Judge Lewis in the special election. He won easily.

But he had had a much harder time in the deadlocked nominating convention on April 2, 1948, at London. County chairmen and chairwomen from the 17 counties in the district voted to select a nominee. Thirty-two people voted and 17 votes were needed for the nomination.

Five men were placed in the race, but after several ballots there were 15 votes for Lewis, 15 for John M. Robsion, Jr., son of the late Congressman, and 2 for Charles L. Seale, Booneville.

The tally remained unchanged for three ballots. Judge Lewis was backed by former Gov. Simion Willis' faction of the party.

After the seventh ballot the younger Robsion withdrew. He said,

> It is harmful to the party to continue this deadlock. While we all have our personal ambitions, there comes a time when somebody has to give.

On the eighth ballot, Judge Lewis won with 27 votes to 4 for Seale.

Mr. Robsion later moved to Louisville and was elected to Congress from the Third District and is the GOP nominee for Governor this year.

Judge Lewis did not seek reelection in the fall of 1948.

He was born in Perry County, Ky., on September 22, 1868. He was educated in public schools in Perry and Leslie Counties and in Hyden High School and Laurel County Seminary. A private tutor taught him law.

In 1890 he became Leslie County sheriff. He was named Leslie County school superintendent in 1894. In 1899 he was elected to the Kentucky General Assembly.

From 1903 to 1909 he was Commonwealth's attorney in the 27th judicial district. He served as circuit judge of that district from 1909 to 1921, and from 1927 to 1933.

Survivors include his wife; the son, Judge Ray Lewis; and a daughter.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend to the family and many friends and relatives of Judge Lewis my deepest sympathy in the loss of this well-loved man and able leader from my part of Kentucky.

More Young People Should Learn That They Owe Something to Society

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 5, 1959

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, today, one of the major social challenges in the country is that of channeling the vast reservoirs of energy, talent, imagination, and ideas of our youth into constructive activities. In this fast-moving age, the rapid changes in our social and economic system—as well as the scientific and technological revolution—unfortunately, has not provided adequately for the exercise of the talents and abilities of youth.

Consequently, several undesirable circumstances have arisen.

First. We are letting go to waste too much of the capabilities of our youth.

Second. Energies being dissipated in just killing time could better be channeled into constructive activities. In circumstances of this kind, someone has suggested that "the best way to kill time is to 'work it to death'."

Third. Because of their boundless energies not channeled into constructive outlets, too many teenagers are getting into trouble.

Regrettably, the Nation has experienced waves of bad behavior, ranging from truancy to murder. As a result, the rate of court cases is rising at an alarming rate. For example, it has been increasing 136 percent in 1948 through 1957.

What is the answer?

A great many studies and constructive efforts are underway at the National, State, and local levels. Insofar as these can contribute to solution of the problem, these should, of course, be carried forward with all possible speed.

However, I continue to believe that the major responsibility for channeling the talents, abilities, and energies of our young folks likes, first, with the parents, and, second, with the local community.

Although national programs aimed at curbing juvenile delinquency can service a purpose, certainly, we cannot expect the long arm of Uncle Sam to reach into the homes across America, to train individual youths to be useful, productive citizens.

Because of the minimum opportunities for jobs and other activities to employ their energies, however, parents, I believe, require the assistance of the local communities in carrying out projects that will absorb the talents of our young folks.

In view of the wave of crime and misdemeanors, I would hope that, as a nation, we would soon wake up and learn how to deal effectively with this social problem. This should be accomplished before juvenile delinquency becomes an even greater legal and, ultimately, an economic burden as well as a social blight and a personal tragedy to millions of individuals and families.

Unfortunately, there has developed in recent years a kind of "the world owes me a living" philosophy.

For those of us who have experienced a "bit of life," we know this is not true. To the contrary, the person who seeks to live a fruitful, constructive, productive—and, yes, happy life, learns that this is achieved for the most part by dedication to worthwhile causes in a constructive field of endeavor, not by waiting for the world to "give us a handout" for a life—which, incidentally, I firmly believe is not warranted without a commensurate effort made by ourselves.

Recently the La Crosse Tribune published a thoughtful editorial entitled "It's Time for Young People To Learn That They Owe Something to Society."

Reflective of a good common sense that bears significantly upon the juvenile delinquency problem, I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the La Crosse Tribune, Sept. 1, 1959]

IT'S TIME FOR YOUNG PEOPLE TO LEARN THAT THEY OWE SOMETHING TO SOCIETY

A good house painter is a busy fellow these days most anywhere. Often he needs a helper.

We know a skilled, conscientious painter who took on a boy of around 18. The boy seemed willing enough to learn, and he soon was drawing $1.50 an hour, pretty fair country wages for a beginner.

Not too long afterward, however, the painter noticed that his boy was doing a pretty careless job. He was forgetting to paint whole sides of radiators, to finish off trim, and so on. The man found he was spending hours tracking after his apprentice, redoing the unfinished work.

Listening to the painter's complaints, the boy was unmoved. He didn't say he would try to do better. He said: "I won't be able to work for you any more unless I get $2 an hour."

That, needless to say, was the end of the boy's job.

But the point here is that he is just one of countless youngsters, entering the labor market either temporarily or permanently, who think the world owes them a good wage whether they work well or not.

Employers the Nation over can tell you stories of young applicants and workers who make astonishing demands in the way of salary and benefits, without offering convincing evidence of either ability or the willingness to work hard and learn.

If the demands are not met, they look elsewhere, with a presumptive arrogance that would ill befit them even if they were loaded wtih talent.

In this age we get an awful lot of this business of the young demanding things, from their parents, their friends, their schools, their employers, without feeling it necessary to offer much in return.

This is not the place to argue how the blame for this circumstance should be distributed. It is the place to say a society is in trouble when any fair proportion of its young people imagines the world owes them a living and a good time.

From parents on down the scale, it's time to tell them that they owe something to society, too. On this tough old crust, you earn your way, one way or another, or in the end you flounder and go under.

"But God said to Jonah, Do you do well to be angry for the plant? And he said, I do well to be angry, angry enough to die."—Jonah 4: 9.

Recent Legislative Actions by Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOR C. TOLLEFSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 5, 1959

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, during the closing days of this session of Congress, action has been taken on several measures which have been of importance to the people of the Nation. A great many of my constituents have written to me concerning them.

THE FEDERAL HIGHWAY PROGRAM

The Federal highway program faced a serious crisis when it appeared that there would not be sufficient funds to keep it on schedule. Several projects in my State were confronted with the possibility of a slowdown or a shutdown. Not only did this involve a loss of work and jobs in the State but it meant that the traffic requirements of the State would fall further short of the necessary goals.

The President had requested a cent-and-a-half increase in the Federal gasoline tax. The House of Representatives after a delay of many months finally approved a compromise measure which calls for a 1-cent increase in gas taxes until July 1, 1961. At that date 50 percent of the 10-percent tax on automobiles and 62½ percent of the receipts from the 8-percent tax on parts and accessories—presently going into the general fund—would be transferred to the highway fund. This measure will permit the highway program to continue with only a minor slowdown.

LABOR LEGISLATION

Following lengthy hearings, and after intense debate and consideration, Congress finally approved a bill calling for reforms in management-labor relations. Several bills were considered. Foremost was the Kennedy proposal, S. 1555, which was approved by the Senate last April. The House Education and Labor Committee reported the Elliott labor bill, H.R. 8342, which was supported by Speaker SAM RAYBURN in his nationwide broadcast. Another bill, the so-called Landrum-Griffin bill, H.R. 8400, bore the names of its authors and was supported by the President over a nationwide TV broadcast. A fourth bill was known as the Shelley bill, H.R. 8490.

Eighty-five percent of the provisions of all bills were similar. They differed chiefly with respect to the extent to which they amended the Taft-Hartley Act. The Landrum-Griffin bill went furthest in this regard and was spoken of as the strongest bill. However, with respect to democracy in unions, elections of officers, reporting of union finances and the protection of union funds, all four bills contained approximately the same provisions. There was little or no controversy over these. The main controversies arose over the proposed amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act. The House approved the Landrum-Griffin bill. Because it differed from the Senate-passed Kennedy bill, it was necessary to send the matter to conference. The House and Senate conferees worked diligently for about 2½ weeks, and finally reached an agreement on a compromise measure. In effect, the Landrum-Griffin bill was softened somewhat. Both Houses of Congress then approved the compromise measure and it was sent to the President for his signature.

INCREASED INTEREST ON GOVERNMENT BONDS

Congress gave the President authority to give 40 million Americans who hold $42 billion of series E and H savings bonds bigger returns on their investment. The President in his message to Congress had requested that the ceiling on interest rates on long-term Government bonds be eliminated. People were not purchasing them in the amounts required to meet the Government's financial needs. Since 1956 bond redemptions have generally exceeded bond sales. In other words, more bonds previously acquired were being turned back than were being purchased.

The President in his message said that people in a free society could not be compelled to buy Government bonds when they could get better returns on their money from other investments. The Government needs to borrow money, and the Treasury Department has been confronted with the necessity of placing the entire national debt in short-term bonds on which the law does not impose maximum interest rates. It would be difficult to estimate what the cost of such a procedure would be to the Government.

After considerable delay by the House Committee on Ways and Means, a bill was presented to the House of Representatives which would eliminate the ceiling on the interest on series E and H savings bonds. The limit on the interest rate since 1957 has been 3.26 percent. The bill would also authorize an increase in interest rates on outstanding series E and H bonds. The President is given authority to increase rates in both instances where he finds the national welfare so requires. The bill contained certain other provisions to make Government bonds more attractive and salable. After some debate, the House of Representatives approved the measure.

TVA CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

Congress in recent years has not appropriated all the funds which the Tennessee Valley Authority has requested for plant development and new facilities—particularly steamplants for the generation of electrical energy. Congress passed a measure which authorized TVA to sell $750 million in bonds to obtain the capital it needed. There would then be no need for annual appropriations by Congress.

The President vetoed the first TVA bill because it attempts to divorce the TVA's construction program of new power-producing projects from executive review and would not afford an opportunity for the President to exercise his constitutional role in the legislative process.

When it was agreed by the House and the Senate to delete the objectionable features from the bill by separate action, the President signed the TVA proposal.

Laos Crisis Creates More Evidence for Need of U.N. Police Force

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 5, 1959

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a news report, prepared by me, relating to the crisis in Laos.

There being no objection, the news release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILEY SAYS LAOS CRISIS CREATES MORE EVIDENCE FOR NEED OF U.N. POLICE FORCE

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin, ranking Republican of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, today cited the Lao crisis as one more bit of evidence on the need for a United Nations police force.

"Around the world, the Communists—in Laos, on the India-China border, and elsewhere—continue to engage in infiltration, attempts at subversion, and outright aggression, to attempt to accomplish their goal of world conquest.

"The establishment of an effective U.N. police force, I believe, could do much to control and/or prevent such situations," Senator WILEY said.

"Overall, the nations of the world must increase their efforts to encourage respect for territorial integrity, international law, adherence to high standards of conduct, and, more particularly, to discourage such infiltration and aggression as is now occurring in Laos.

"Until enforcement machinery is provided, however, we can—in view of the Communists pursual of their goal of world domination—expect this kind of outlawry to continue to create threats to the security of countries.

"We recall that, in 1958, the U.S. Congress, by resolution, expressed its support for establishment of such an international force. Unfortunately, opposition by the Soviet Union has, until now, prevented the creation of such a force within the United Nations.

"The Lao crisis—as well as the India-China border dispute and other such Communist-inspired crises—furnish additional evidence of the need for establishment of an effective U.N. police force to curb such violations and provide for a more secure peace," Senator WILEY concluded.

Us or Laos?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE SILER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 5, 1959

Mr. SILER. Mr. Speaker, I note in the U.S. News & World Report of September 7, 1959, the statement that U.S. aid to Laos has cost the taxpayers of our country $225 million since 1955. Laos is the little country in southeast Asia where the Chinese Reds are now coming across the border and trying to conquer this small, rugged bit of sovereignty and convert it to their own use and dominion. The headlines of our daily papers are right now full of Laos and the problem of Laos. Apparently the $225 million of U.S. aid has done nothing to secure Laos or to keep it out of the vest pocket of communism. The U.S. aid mentioned has paid for the following, according to the U.S. News & World Report:

1. A local army of 25,000 men.
2. Jungle highways, a power station, irrigation dams.
3. Health services, sanitation, development of farming, communications, mining.

4. Planning for future flood control, power, irrigation projects.

5. Training for teachers and technicians.

Although this $225 million donation may have done nothing whatever toward its intended purpose over in Laos, just think what it would have done for us—not Laos—in some of the underprivileged sections of America if we had sent the aid up the creeks and into the hollows of our own country. With this kind of help we could have built in all the school districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and West Virginia some adequate and badly needed school buildings; or we could have constructed badly needed flood control projects in every water damaged section in Kentucky and perhaps in one or two additional States besides.

I am willing that no one should ever treat Laos as a louse but I am wondering if it is not time for us to quit treating the good American in our own house as a louse.

Support of S. 2540: Automatic Promotion of Certain Officers Upon Retirement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 5, 1959

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement by me in support of S. 2540.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR ESTES KEFAUVER

For 34 years, the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard have enjoyed a tradition established by law allowing members of these services who were commended in combat to receive an automatic promotion upon retirement. This promotion did not carry with it extra pay or pension, but merely the prestige accorded to persons who had served their country above and beyond the call of duty.

On July 27 the Senate passed H.R. 4413, which had appended to the body of the bill a repeal of this tradition, effective November 1. Since this provision was never available to members of the Army and Air Force, it was, as it stood, discriminatory against members of these services. Accordingly, I introduced a bill which would extend this privilege to members of these services. My bill has been opposed by the Department of Defense, and in the absence of passage, perhaps termination of the privilege for naval officers will be the only way to end the discrimination.

With this, I am not taking issue. It is the abruptness of the termination which I oppose. When Naval, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard officers have charted their careers over a period of years expecting in good faith to have this tombstone promotion, as it is called, awarded to them in the twilight of their service, 2½ months is not enough time to change course. For those who may want to retire early in order to get in under the wire, adequate opportunity to revise their retirement plans is not afforded.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], has introduced on behalf of himself and others, S. 2540, which will continue until July 2, 1960, authority to promote these officers who have been commended for combat action. I want to express my support for this bill. I believe it will effectively accomplish the original purpose, without working any undue hardship on the officers which would be affected.

Are Steelworkers Wages Too High?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELMER J. HOLLAND
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 5, 1959

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Speaker, one of the baseless lies repeated over and over again in steel industry propaganda and by uninformed persons is that steelworkers already get paid too much. Any homemaker in a steelworker's family could tell you how ridiculous this accusation is as she struggles to make ends meet on the meager and very uncertain wage of a steel employee. And anyone familiar with the hard, grueling conditions under which steelworkers turn out more and more steel per hour would concede that steel wages are hardly adequate.

Much is made of a Bureau of Labor Statistics report that shows average earnings in the steel industry during June 1959 came to approximately $3.10 an hour. The implication is that this is a normal wage rate collected by the steelworkers 8 hours a day, 5 days a week, 52 weeks a year, bringing his annual pay to a figure exceeding $6,000. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The $3.10 hourly figure was compiled at a time when the steel industry was feverishly stockpiling its product in anticipation of the mill shutdown it planned to force upon its employees. In estimating average hourly earnings, the BLS lumps together with the base rate of employees all compensation including overtime pay, extra pay for holiday work, incentive earnings paid for extra exertion on the part of employees, shift premiums and all other wage payments which the steelworker deservedly may have coming. There is no assurance he can continue this rate of earnings and there is enough proof to show that he seldom can even approach this earning rate under normal plant operations.

Only once in the last 13 years have steelworkers averaged as much as 40 hours a week. In 1958, for instance, the average steelworker wages for the entire year totaled only $4,700. This is a far cry from the $6,000 a year which industry would like the public to believe that steelworkers earn.

Workers in many other industries earn more hourly and annually than the steelworkers. Seven other industries have base rates which top those in steel.

And while industry profits are customarily quoted after taxes, no industry spokesman ever explains that the steelworkers wage figures used publicly are before taxes and before the many deductions which put quite a hole in the average paycheck. Steelworkers can spend only their take-home pay—not the exaggerated, blown-up and mythical wage earnings which the industry talks about.

It is interesting to note that the city worker's family budget, prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, calls for a minimum income of about $4,700 yearly for a family of four. But in 1958, one-half of all steelworkers did not earn even enough to "afford" the low standards provided by this BLS budget. This budget, mind you, was last calculated by the Government in October 1951, and is based largely on studies of family spending in the 1930's. The standard of living attainable today under this criteria is, of course, hopelessly inadequate. Still, even under these extremely low standards of existence, this budget shows one-half of the union members in steel did not qualify.

The more adequate Heller Wage Earner's Budget in September 1958 required annual earnings of $6,087 for a home-renter and $6,435 for a homeowner. Three-fourths of all steelworkers in 1958 failed to earn $6,000 annually. This factual study by one of our leading universities thus demonstrates how pitifully meager steelworkers wages are in comparison to what they actually need to enjoy a fairly decent standard of living.

Those who have some knowledge of steel mill operations will readily concede that a steelworker earns every penny of his wage. He puts up with intense heat and prolonged periods of concentrated effort calling for the fullest skills and demanding the heaviest type of responsibility. He endures smoke and fumes, dangerous dust and suffocating blasts of gas-laden air billowing and blowing about him. He is exposed to ear-shattering noise and torrid, grimy, and hazardous conditions equaled in few other industries.

In spite of the challenging conditions under which he works and despite the inadequate compensation he gets, the steelworker of today is the most productive and efficient the industry has ever employed.

Year after year, industry records show that less and less man-hours are needed to produce a ton of finished steel. In 1949, it required 16.3 man-hours. By 1954, this figure was reduced to 15 man-hours, and to 13 man-hours by 1956. The latest figures, as of April 1959, show that it takes but 10.7 man-hours to make the same ton of steel.

In the face of these startling employee productivity figures, the American public must be completely baffled by the unfair and purely ridiculous charges of "featherbedding" and "loafing" which the steel companies have injected in current negotiations with the union. This hardly squares with the factual report by Secretary of Labor Mitchell which shows the steel companies are making more and more money with fewer and fewer steelworkers on the job.

Steel profits so far this year are rolling in at the unprecedented and breathtaking rate of $3 billion a year. Yet today there are 44,000 fewer steelworkers on the payrolls than there were in 1953 and this reduced work force has actually turned out 30 percent more steel.

The rich, prosperous steel industry, which accumulated its record profits with the hard work and sweat of its highly productive employees chooses to ignore these plain facts. Instead of helping the union find ways to reward him through wage and contract improvements, the companies are unbelievably trying to punish and set the steelworker backward.

There has never been a more brazen, cruel, and heartless attempt by any industry to not only deprive employees of economic justice but to confiscate what already belongs to them.

Address by Congressman Thaddeus Machrowicz in Warsaw, Poland, on the 20th Anniversary of Hitler's Attack on the Polish People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN BRADEMAS
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 5, 1959

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, this week marks the 20th anniversary of Hitler's infamous attack on the brave and noble people of Poland. The brutal invasion of Poland in 1939 in turn touched off World War II, the war which brought so much suffering to millions of human beings throughout the world.

It is fitting indeed that two decades after Hitler's attack on Warsaw the ringing voice of freedom should be heard in that great city. The voice was that of our distinguished colleague from Michigan, Congressman THADDEUS MACHROWICZ, who spoke last week in the chamber of the Parliament of Poland on the opening day of the meeting of the Interparliamentary Union. Our able colleague, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS], also a delegate to this conference, has told the House of the tremendous ovation received by Mr. MACHROWICZ at the conclusion of his address, which was delivered in Polish.

Congressman MACHROWICZ is a native of Poland and served during World War I in the Polish Army.

Mr. Speaker, as we reflect on the continuing desire of the people of Poland to enjoy the full blessings of liberty, I am sure that Members of Congress will be moved as they read the address delivered on August 27, 1959, by Congressman MACHROWICZ in Warsaw. The address follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. THADDEUS M. MACHROWICZ

Mr. Chairman, honorable delegates, my request that as an American delegate I be permitted to speak in the Polish language is, I realize, somewhat unusual, but I would like to justify it by citing certain facts. I am personally of Polish birth and served in the Polish Army in World War I. I became an American citizen and the American Nation has entrusted me for the last 10 years with membership in its highest parliamentary body, and lately with membership in the delegation to the Interparliamentary Union.

I am very proud of my ancestry in the great Polish nation. I am equally proud of my citizenship in the great American Nation. This somewhat dual character of my individual membership impels me to make a few remarks which are probably more appropriate from me.

In his excellent report, the General Secretary called our attention several times to the great advances made in the last few years by the Polish nation in the economic and political fields under conditions which we all recognize as most difficult. I agree wholeheartedly with his findings in this respect.

It was unquestionably proper that in his address of welcome to this Interparliamentary Conference, the Honorable Aleksander Zawadzki, chairman of the state council of our host, the Republic of Poland, called to the attention of the delegates that this historic session is being held in Warsaw on the 20th anniversary of the commencement of World War II.

It was right here in Warsaw 20 years ago, on September 1, 1939, that a shower of bombs thrown without warning, without declaration of war, put into motion World War II with all its years of terror, loss of lives, and of untold damage.

There is no city in the world which withstood so gallantly so much suffering, loss of human lives, so much wanton destruction. A brief visit around the town still shows the scars left by those days of horror, despite the remarkable efforts of reconstruction by the Government and nation.

On this 20th anniversary of the commencement of the greatest military tragedy suffered by humanity—one which cast mourning over the entire world—a tragedy which took the lives of 20 million persons—in Poland alone 6 million or over 15 percent of the population—I would like to offer my respect to those to whom it is due. Above all, it belongs to the courageous population of Warsaw and all of Poland, which by its sacrifice of human lives, blood, suffering, and general destruction, demonstrated actively its dedication to those ideals which we in the Interparliamentary Union acknowledge, opposing aggression, that terrible threat to international security.

In discussing problems of international security and disarmament, we cannot, however, rest in paying our respect to this nation. The reconstruction of Warsaw from ruins and shambles, through the great effort of the Polish nation and Government, inescapably casts upon us the query: What was the reason for this catastrophe which literally destroyed an entire generation? How was this gigantic historic process, the results of which are felt bitterly by the entire world in both hemispheres, put into motion? And what lesson should the world derive from this experience?

I would like to recall to the honorable delegates some historical facts which throw significant and important light on the general problem of international security.

When 20 years ago, on September 1, 1939, the forces of Hitler made the unprovoked attack on Poland, they completely disregarded their international commitments, particularly the freely-entered-into Polish-German pact of nonaggression of January 26, 1934.

Only 16 days later, on September 17, 1939, Poland's powerful neighbors from the East commenced occupation of the eastern territories of Poland.

This joint action was by no means coincidental. On the contrary, it has been fully documented in the secret Stalin-Hitler pact of August 23, 1939.

This secret pact, concluded 8 days before the German aggression on Poland, cynically decided on the future division of Poland, an independent nation. These secret negotiations became public only after the war, after publication of the secret Hitler documents which fell into American hands after Hitler's defeat in 1945.

My limited time does not permit me to cite more completely from these documents, copies of which are in my hands, but they do disclose how the plan was actually put into action.

In reminding the delegates of these undeniable historical facts in connection with the attack on Poland, I sincerely hope that in consideration of that historical moment, we keep in mind all the facts and keep them in proper perspective.

A full and serious contemplation of these historical facts led me to the introduction of a resolution dealing directly with international security, which would serve to help prevent the recurrence of another world war.

Unfortunately, for purely procedural reasons, since it was not listed on the Secretary's desk within the prescribed time, it cannot be considered without unanimous consent, which I realize I could not obtain. The resolution merely states that the Interparliamentary Union solemnly declares that conspiracy between governments directed toward the destruction of the independence, freedom, territorial integrity and internal safety of any other state shall be deemed an international crime and, further, it is urged upon all parliaments to take effective measures on their respective national levels precluding the commission of such crimes.

I regret that we probably will not have the opportunity at this session to discuss that resolution, so proper and necessary to assure peace and security to the entire world. I do believe, however, that we shall never have fully accomplished our obligation in that respect until we adopt that or some similar resolution.

What's the Big Rush To Adjourn?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 5, 1959

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement by me in regard to the prospective sine die adjournment of the Congress.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR KEATING

WHAT'S THE BIG RUSH?

That annual malady commonly called adjournment fever has made itself felt in recent days, and I am very troubled by what this development might portend. We have been witnessing today, as earlier in the week, some of the manifestations of this illness which appears to be peculiar to the banks of the Potomac.

I certainly want to join with my colleagues in commiserating with the leadership as these events have unfolded. And, of course, while the problems of a minority leader are great, those of a majority leader are prodigious. We should all have great sympathy for the vicissitudes of the majority leader as he labors with his many complex assignments and coworkers in these closing days.

However, we cannot abdicate our responsibilities as Senators in these last days of the session and close up shop without completing important tasks. No one seems to want to say it, but there is a strong aura of suspicion that some people want us to fold up our tent and leave before the impending visit of Mr. Khrushchev.

I must challenge any decision to adjourn before the end of next week if it will mean that must items will be lost in the shuffle. Khrushchev may be the Typhoid Mary of international statesmanship, but is that any sign that free Americans lack immunity to the virus he peddles? It really won't hurt us to be in the same city with him; nothing says we have to invite him into our parlor.

Now, there are a number of very vital legislative matters which must command the attention of the Senate before we can adjourn in good conscience. I refer particularly to the matter of civil rights.

We have received repeated assurances from the majority leadership that bills in this vital field will be brought up before the end of the session. But now there is talk of running out of town in advance of Khrushchev's visit without acting on civil rights. That, in my view, would be unthinkable, and I shall oppose any movement in that direction with all the weapons at my command. Surely, this Congress cannot in good faith adjourn without at least extending the life of the Civil Rights Commission. And there are other important proposals in this field which I think we should act upon.

It would be ironic, indeed, if we were to slight the civil rights of Americans just to avoid the presence of a man who has done more to undermine civil rights than any man in the world.

It is clearly beneath the dignity and prestige of the Congress of the United States for us to end our work and turn our back on the pressing needs of the Nation just because a foreign dictator comes to our shores. I trust this view will prevail as we enter the closing days of this session.

Procedure Followed When a Visiting Head of State Is Invited To Address a Joint Meeting of the Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 5, 1959

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, in my remarks I include for the information of the Members a statement I recently made to the press and to television and radio stations:

There is considerable misunderstanding, even in the minds of Members of Congress, about the procedure that is followed in connection with the head of a state visiting our country and addressing a joint meeting of the Congress. In such case, the request always comes from the State Department to the leaders of the Congress, asking us to cooperate with the State Department in making such arrangements. In a press conference recently, President Eisenhower unintentionally made a statement to the contrary, to the effect that the executive department has nothing to do with the extending of an invitation. All such invitations start in the State Department, and they have been confined to those persons who are heads of state. In the case of Mr. Khrushchev, he is not the head of state of the Soviet Union. He is the dictator, and he is the boss, in every respect. Of that there is no question, and the world knows it, but he is not technically the head of state.

When a head of a state is visiting our country, the request for a joint meeting of the Congress comes to the leaders of the Congress from the State Department.

Three Stars for Surgeons General—Eisenhower Establishes the Precedent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 5, 1959

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see that the Surgeon General of the Army is about to receive the rank of lieutenant general. I highly commend this action which is long overdue recognition of the vital importance of the Medical Department with its Medical Corps, Dental Corps, Medical Service Corps, and Nurse Corps, to the maintenance of the health and welfare of our servicemen and their families and to the combat readiness and efficiency of our Armed Forces.

The devotion and skill of our medical personnel in preventing disease and in reducing the fatalities and disabilities resulting from combat and during peacetime, has been a tremendous factor in increasing the manpower available for active service. This also has reduced our overall manpower requirements and as a result has saved millions of dollars in the cost of pay and support for these additional personnel, in medical care, retirement, and pension costs.

This achievement has been possible because of the strong, dynamic, and competent leadership and professional guidance of the Surgeons General of the Army, Navy, and Air Force.

As I indicated, I think it is most fitting that the Surgeon General of the Army has been recognized by this increase in rank. This recognition should also be extended to the Surgeons General of the Navy and Air Force. Their responsibilities are of no less importance than that of the Surgeon General of the Army.

The Surgeons General of the Army, Navy, and Air Force represent the Armed Forces and military medicine in many civilian professional and medical research groups. Unequal rank between the three has the connotation of secondary status to the medical department of the service or services not so recognized. The greater majority of the physicians of the country have served in one of the armed services.

The appointment of all of the Surgeons General to the grade of lieutenant general or vice admiral would be a significant recognition of the essential contributions of the physicians of the country in providing medical care for our servicemen, and conversely the lack of such recognition of one of the Surgeons General would be a reflection on the contributions and services of the physicians who are serving or have served in that service.

I have on several occasions recommended and proposed legislation to provide such three-star grade recognition of the importance of the medical departments of the armed services. During World War II the Surgeon General of the U.S. Navy served in the grade of vice admiral. Today the Surgeon General of the U.S. Navy—the world's largest navy—is a rear admiral while his counterpart in the British and French Navies are vice admirals. This reflects adversely on our Navy as a whole and on our country.

Of great advantage to the Armed Forces have been the advances in clinical medicine, medical research, and military medicine in this space and atomic age. Many of the aspects of military medicine are unique and have no direct counterpart in civilian medicine. These activities are vital in the adaptation of military medicine to our revolutionary changes in weapons systems with the challenge and problems of space flight, jet and rocket aircraft, and nuclear propulsion in aircraft, submarines, and ships. Air crew and submarine personnel selection, operational fatigue, vehicle habitability and personal equipment problems, atomic and nuclear hazard controls, and mass casualty treatment have necessitated major contributions by medical department personnel.

The Surgeons General are each responsible for the medical care of nearly a million men and a somewhat greater number of dependents and retired personnel. Each is responsible for a large industrial medicine program. For example, the Surgeon General of the Navy is responsible for the health of a far-flung military and civilian enterprise which has many ramifications due to the complex mission of the Navy, including the Marine Corps, with its aviation, submarine, surface ship, and amphibious operations. To support this mission, the Navy is one of the largest employers of civilian skills in the United States—over 300,000 people—and the Surgeon General of the Navy thus has direct responsibiilty for the occupational health and safety of this great group of people.

The mission of the medical department of the Navy involves plant facilities whose value is roughly one-half billion dollars and includes research and preventive medicine units, medical department schools, dispensaries, station hospitals, and 26 Navy hospitals whose average daily load is 10,000 patients with military and civilian staff of some 16,000 persons. Some 40,000 medical, dental, medical service and nurse corps officers, warrant officers, and enlisted hospital corps and civilian personnel come under the professional training and administrative responsibilities of the Surgeon General of the Navy. Similar responsibilities in industrial, operational, and clinical and military medicine and medical readiness and training evolve upon the other Surgeons General.

In closing I emphasize again that the importance of three-star rank for the Surgeons General of the Armed Forces—Army, Navy, including the Marine Corps, and Air Force—evolves about both military and nonmilitary aspects of their role and responsibilities due to the scope of the former and the close interrelationship with civilian medicine, medical education and training, medical research, and hospital administration. The Surgeons General serve on major committees of civilian medicine. While they are primarily doctors they represent the Armed Forces in civilian medical gatherings and thus their rank is a factor in the recognition of the importance and contributions of military medicine to the country's defense.

Although considerable training and adaptation of civilian medical techniques is required to meet particular military medical applications, the Armed Forces must depend on civilian medicine for its basic source of medical manpower. The higher rank thus would be a tangible acknowledgment to the doctors of this country that the contributions of their profession to the defense of the country and the welfare of the servicemen is recognized and it would also be a recognition of the scope and essentiality of military medicine to our operational readiness and our ability to preserve the peace.

Significance of National Legislation to Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 5, 1959

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, now that the end of the first session is in sight, there is opportunity to review some of the major legislative work that has been accomplished.

Looking at the calendar—and the schedule ahead—it is apparent that important work remains to be done.

Recently, in a broadcast prepared for delivery over Wisconsin radio stations, I reviewed the significance—and benefits to be derived from—action in these fields—particularly as it affects Wisconsin. These include highway, health benefits for civil servants, expansion of the school milk program, extension of the Federal Airport Act, liberalizing veterans pensions, and others.

I am aware, of course, that—in view of Uncle Sam's difficult budget problems—it is important that we take a look, from time to time, at the role played by the Federal Government in national programs.

That is why I was particularly pleased to join in cosponsoring the resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution 70, introduced by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], aimed at redefining State-Federal responsibilities in the economic field.

Although this proposal for establishing a joint congressional committee was introduced late in the session—too late for final action on it—I would hope that this would receive early consideration next year.

As a review of some of the major legislative action taken this session, I ask unanimous consent to have the text of my broadcast printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILEY OUTLINES BENEFITS OF LEGISLATION FOR WISCONSIN

(Excerpts of address prepared for delivery by Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican of Chippewa Falls, over Wisconsin radio stations)

Friends, the 86th Congress is now winding up its 1st session. There is, of course, still a good deal of work to be accomplished prior to adjournment. These include a number of major pieces of legislation of particular interest to Wisconsin.

In evaluating legislation, questions arise such as: What will it do for us? How will it affect our progress in Racine, Milwaukee, Green Bay, Superior, Chippewa Falls, La Crosse, and other fine communities around the State?

Briefly, I would like to view the outlook for benefits to us.

NEEDED: FUNDS FOR HIGHWAY PROGRAM

First, let's take a look at the highway program. Unfortunately, the Congress has been too slow in acting upon legislation to provide additional funds needed to finance the highway building program. As a result, there has been serious curtailment in this program, which is designed to provide us with an improved and expanded network of highways.

"Question: What is its significance to Wisconsin, Senator?

"Answer: As of June 30, 1959, 180 miles of roadways were either under construction, or advertised for bid, in the Badger State. This amounted to $57.1 million in expenditures of which $49 million in Federal funds were contributed.

"Under the Highway Act of 1956, Wisconsin was scheduled to receive $26 million in 1961 and $23 million in 1962. Unless Congress acts to provide additional money, however, the State may get nothing in 1961 and only $5 million in 1962.

"Currently, Congress is considering ways and means of providing additional financing for this program. The task is to find an equitable way to provide funds for improving and expanding the National System of Interstate Highways—so badly needed to handle the ever-greater volumes of traffic now, and in the years ahead."

AID TO EDUCATION

"Question: What about aid to education, Senator WILEY?

"Answer: Under the Defense Education Act, passed in 1958, Wisconsin's State educational agencies and nonprofit private schools will receive financial assistance from the Federal Government for the purposes of (1) acquiring laboratory and other special equipment suitable for use in providing education in science, mathematics, or modern foreign languages; (2) expansion and improvement of supervisory and related services in public elementary and secondary schools in these fields; and (3) minor remodeling of laboratory or other space used for such materials or equipment.

"Recently, the State legislature took action to make it possible for Wisconsin to participate in this vital program to improve education in the fields of science and technology; with Wisconsin being eligible to receive up to $1,900,000 per year for the next 3 years on a dollar-for-dollar matching basis.

"Question: Is there any new legislation?

"Answer: As of now, there are pending in committees—in both the House and the Senate—bills to provide more Federal aid for constructing classrooms, laboratory facilities, and general aid. There now appears to be serious questions that there will be final action this session on this legislation."

HEALTH BENEFITS FOR CIVIL SERVANTS

"Question: Senator WILEY, as I understand it, Congress has approved a program of health insurance for folks under civil service.

"Would this benefit many people in Wisconsin?

"Answer: About 20,000 civil servants would be eligible for participation in this program. The costs would be shared on a 50–50 basis by the employee and the employer—in this case, Uncle Sam.

SCHOOL MILK PROGRAM

"Question: Senator, I recall that you supported legislation to expand the school milk program.

"Answer: Yes, the bill, S. 1289—which I cosponsored—has been enacted to provide up to $84 million in fiscal 1960 for supplying milk in the Nation's schools, child-care institutions, summer camps, and similar nonprofit institutions. Under this program, Wisconsin children consumed over 80 million half-pints of milk in 1959; with over 4,500 schools and institutions participating. Approximately $2,745,000 of Federal funds was expended in financing this fine project. Overall, the program offers a splendid opportunity for improving the health of our youth; in addition, it provides a splendid outlet for surplus milk."

EXPANDING AIRPORTS

"Question: With the increasing volume of air traffic, is there any action to expand airport facilities?

"Answer: The Federal Airport Act has been extended by Congress this session. Under provisions of the new law, $993,906 annually would be provided in Federal funds for the construction and expansion of airports in Wisconsin during the next 2 years.

"The program would provide for airport facilities, taxiways, land acquisition, parking areas, and other purposes."

LIBERALIZING VETERANS' PENSIONS

"Question: Did Congress pass any veterans' legislation this session?

"Answer: Yes. The Congress approved—and the President has signed the bill, H.R. 7650—to liberalize pension benefits for veterans with non-service-connected disabilities, and their widows and orphans.

"Overall, more than 1 million pensioners in Wisconsin, and throughout the Country, would benefit from the liberalizing law. Among other things, the bill would provide pensions for widows and children of World War II and Korean veterans.

"The bill, of course, is not a completely comprehensive measure covering all problems in this field. However, it was designed to attempt to put benefits more on the basis of need."

VETO OF HOUSING AND RIVERS AND HARBORS BILLS

"Question: Senator, what about the housing and the rivers and harbors bills?

"Answer: As you know, the President vetoed measures in both these fields, because he felt the expenditures were too high.

"Now, the Congress is faced with the challenge of taking action—as I believe it should—on modified bills to carry forward these essential programs.

"Although there are many features in the housing bill, for example, it is particularly important that congressional action be taken to extend the FHA insurance authorization program. Under FHA, millions of American families have purchased homes. In Wisconsin, over 3,000 home mortgages, amounting to over $37 million, were processed in 1958.

During the 1935–58 period, the FHA insured 39,671 mortgages in the Badger State.

"Overall, this program has helped to make it possible for three out of every five American families to own their own homes.

"Under the rivers and harbors bill, too, there are several Wisconsin projects—either for construction or for planning work. Among them were: work on the Mellen Channel; moving the village of Odanah, and raising the school, on the Bad River, construction at Bayfield Harbor; planning on the Eau Galle River; planning at Saxon Harbor; and planinng at Two Rivers Harbor."

SUMMARY

"Question: Senator WILEY, I know our listeners appreciate getting your review of the significance to Wisconsin of some of the major legislation acted upon in this session of Congress, including: Highways, education, health benefits, school milk, airports, veterans' pensions, housing, and rivers and harbors development projects.

"Answer: Naturally, I am delighted that Wisconsin is sharing so significantly in these national programs.

"However, I believe it is important to make clear that—even though we are receiving substantial amounts of aid in several fields—it is well to remind ourselves that this is not a 'free gift' from Uncle Sam. Every Federal dollar that is spent comes out of the American taxpayer's pocket—yours and mine.

"Consequently, I believe it is extremely important that we take a new look—from time to time—at the kind of role Uncle Sam is playing in these programs.

"As President Eisenhower, reflecting the philosophy of Lincoln, has said:

" 'The legitimate object of government is to do for a community of people whatever they need to have done, but cannot do at all, or cannot so well do for themselves, in their separate and individual capacities. In all that people can individually do as well for themselves, government ought not to interfere.' "

COMMITTEE TO STUDY FEDERAL-STATE RELATIONSHIPS

To better define State and Federal responsibilities, I have recently joined in cosponsoring a measure to set up a joint congressional committee. The purpose would be to study the entire field of economic relations between the Federal Government and the States. Following its study, the committee would report to Congress the results of its findings, together with recommendations on ways and means of remedying the many problems which recurrently arise in the field of Federal-State economic relations.

Specifically, the committee would aim to (1) insure fair and equitable distribution among the several States of Federal funds disbursed under grants-in-aid programs, (2) clarify and redefine relations between the Federal Government and the States in the field of taxation, and (3) restore to the States functions which are primarily their responsibility and which the States themselves are financially able to carry out.

CONCLUSION

Now, friends, I have greatly appreciated the opportunity to share this program with you.

This is your senior Senator, ALEX WILEY, saying, "Thanks for listening."

SENATE

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1959

(Legislative day of Saturday, September 5, 1959)

The Senate met at 9 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, as on this day dedicated to the workers of the world we bow at this national altar, make us mindful, we pray, of the just aspirations and righteous goals of those who bend to the heavy tasks of brawn and brain, so essential to the life of all our people.

Grant to us, we pray, a larger comprehension of the essential worth of these, our comrades, that we may inspire them in their struggles, and understand them in their mistakes.

Give to the marching hosts of labor a burning wrath at those who would pollute their sacred movement, and a determination to cleanse their ranks from all that contaminates and degrades.

As more and more they succeed in their efforts for leisure and a fairer wage, teach them not to waste their costly gains on indulgences and pleasures that add nothing to the stature of personality, but to use their rewards for the development of the higher faculties, for enriched minds, for better homes, and nobler manhood. We ask it in the name of the carpenter of Nazareth who declared, "My father worketh hitherto, and I must work," and whose pierced hands are building a fairer habitation for all humanity. Amen.

EXTENSION OF AGRICULTURAL TRADE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1954

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1748) to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I shall shortly send to the desk a concurrent resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

I rise now in opposition to paragraph (q) of the committee amendment on page 3.

I desire to make a brief statement.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION EXPRESSING THE APPRECIATION OF CONGRESS OF THE CONTRIBUTIONS OF AMERICAN LABOR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I believe that most of us are aware of the fact that America's high standard of living and America's economic strength are due in great part to America's working men and working women.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I do not yield for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask protection of my rights to the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas has the floor, and declines to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I hope I shall not be harassed. This will take only 2 or 3 minutes, if Senators will indulge me.

Mr. President, a nation's economic strength rests upon the ability to shape natural resources into the commodities which represent wealth. This is something that cannot be done unless there are skilled and hardworking men and women.

From the beginning, America has been a nation of people who were willing to work, and who knew how to work. These qualities converted a wilderness into an industrial nation that is the envy of the rest of the world.

It is customary in our country—

Mr. President, may we have order at the desk, please?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, it is customary in our country to set aside the first Monday in September to commemorate the services to our country of American labor, both organized and unorganized.

It is a day on which we recall the strength we have received from labor, both in war and in peace.

Mr. President, I believe that every American realizes every day that without American labor and without its high degree of skill, dedication, and patriotism, this would be a weak country, indeed. So it is fitting that we dedicate one day specifically to this end.

The Senate is meeting today in an effort to expedite the transaction of the business of the American people. The Senate has met on Labor Day in the past. It is rather unusual for Congress to be in session in September; but we have been delayed some this year, Mr. President; and we are here, and we are going to face up to our responsibilities.

As I have stated, it is highly unusual for us to meet on this day, because almost invariably we have completed the session by this time.

But I think that one end that should be served today is to adopt a concurrent resolution which I shall send to the desk, and which I believe will express the true feelings of the Congress.

I may say that I have talked to the leadership of the other body about this resolution, and I have talked to the leadership on the minority side of this body about the resolution; and I believe we are of one opinion, namely, that this concurrent resolution should be adopted.

I now read the concurrent resolution:

Whereas American labor has raised its standards of productivity to heights unequaled in world history; and

Whereas the efforts of American labor have brought to this country a standard of living that has no parallel; and

Whereas American labor has served the Nation in peace and war; and

Whereas American labor has been a bulwark of freedom; and

Whereas the first Monday in September is traditionally set aside to commemorate the services of working men and women to our Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress does hereby express its deep realization and appreciation of the basic role that labor plays in our economy and of the contributions that American working men and women have made to America's well-being.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Texas in yielding to me.

The Senator from Texas may recall that on the evening when the Senate adopted the so-called conference report on the labor-management reform bill, I was deeply concerned lest it appear throughout the Nation that we were unmindful of the great contributions which have been made by American labor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. And I thought the Senator from Minnesota made one of the most eloquent, most touching, and most impressive statements, that evening, that I have ever heard in the Senate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Texas.

I believe this concurrent resolution is highly fitting and appropriate; and I am also sure it will be well received and, well heralded throughout the land, because the resolution expresses, in my opinion, the sense of the American people.

Did I correctly understand the Senator from Texas to say it is a concurrent resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes; and I have talked to the leadership of the House of Representatives, and am informed that if the Senate acts promptly on the concurrent resolution, the House will likewise act promptly on it, today.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I hope the Senate will act promptly on it, and will put its stamp of approval on the concurrent resolution.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from California, the acting minority leader.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, it is entirely fitting and proper that on this occasion the Congress salute the men and women who toil with their hands in this free society of ours.

For many years, the first Monday in September has been set aside by our people and our Government to pay homage to our free labor movement, organized and unorganized alike.

Today, as Congress meets on this first Monday in September, it faces many challenges and many rollcalls, the results of which will have a direct bearing on the men and women who toil in this country.

Thus, Mr. President, what we in the Senate do and what the House of Representatives does, as well, on this Labor Day will be of direct and vital concern to American labor.

For us now to pause for a moment and to consider a concurrent resolution in which we, who are the representatives of the American people and the legislative branch of the American Government, express our appreciation of the contributions which the American people—men and women, alike—in the ranks of American labor make to this free economy is, as I have said, a good thing; and I trust that the Congress will proceed unanimously to do so.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President——

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield first to the Senator from Massachusetts; and then I shall yield to my friend, the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I commend the action of the majority leader in submitting the concurrent resolution today; and I heartily concur in the statements which have been made by the Senators who have preceded me in speaking. I wish to join in the statements they have made.

Massachusetts is one of the oldest industrial States of the Union. Massachusetts thrives on industry. As times change and improve, our workers have shown themselves competent to change with the times and to become skilled in new industries.

Today, when we meet on Labor Day—an unusual proceeding, but a necessary one—I wish to join in commending the millions of the American people who work in industry in our great country, and who have made our country what it is today.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. As a former member of organized labor, a member of the American Federation of Teachers, AFL, I wish to joint the distinguished majority leader and my colleagues in expressing my full support of this concurrent resolution. I would hope that every Member of this body would wholeheartedly support this demonstration on our part toward labor for the many fine contributions it has made toward the betterment of our country.

I speak not only as one who, as a member of the teaching profession, belonged to organized labor, but as one who has also worked with his hands in the mines of Montana.

I think this is not only a good gesture, but it is a resolution well deserved; and I repeat, I hope every Member of this body will support it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE].

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, I should like to associate myself with the remarks just made by the distinguished Senator from Montana. I join in support of the resolution.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Has the Senator from Texas asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have not.

Mr. MORSE. Has the Senator from Texas offered the resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have not.

Mr. MORSE. Is the Senator from Texas speaking under the unanimous-consent limitation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator is.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. I wish to join the majority leader and to commend him in offering the resolution. Some of us feel—I know I do, very strongly—that most of the decent and progressive labor legislation which is on our statute books, and which has been placed there during my lifetime, has been the result of the good influence of the majority of the good people in the organized labor movement. I think that ought to be said, and I commend our leadership for having offered the resolution. I join them in supporting it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART].

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I have no wish to intrude on the time of the Senate except to join in what the Senator from Connecticut has just said and to commend and join the leadership that offered the resolution and those who understand and are in sympathy with the labor movement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, I wish to join in support of the resolution honoring labor. As a young man I worked in an industrial plant where labor was not organized. I know what kind of sweatshop work that was, and the gains labor has made since that time. At one time, as a young man, I also worked as a section hand on a railroad.

There have been vast improvements in all the working conditions of labor during the intervening years. Labor is to be commended for the great gains it has made, not only for itself, but gains that have been good for the Nation as a whole.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY].

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have listened with interest and with approbation to what has been said in relation to the resolution, which provides the Congress is hereby expressing its deep realization and appreciation of the basic role labor plays in our economy and of the contributions that American working men and women have made to America's well-being.

May I say that I am the son of an immigrant, who worked in the woods, on the rivers, and in the mills. I remember so well the days of my boyhood, when we did not have what might be called an efficient labor union to protect the rights of honest, hard-working labor.

I have personally worked in the sawmills. I have worked at painting houses. I have clerked in a store. All those activities now are unionized. In my days they were not. Of course, in those days, when we were paid 15 cents an hour for our work in the mills, the dollar gave us three meals and a room. There has been a change.

I want to say I am very happy to join with those today who are expressing their support of labor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Utah [Mr. Moss].

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I am very happy to lend my support to this proposed concurrent resolution presented by the majority leader. Certainly, we here in the Congress should pay our tribute to labor, organized and unorganized, throughout this land.

Today, in my State of Utah, organized labor is having a giant meeting and celebration, and the president of the AFL–CIO, George Meany, is to be the speaker at that meeting.

I had hoped to be in attendance there to pay my respect to that labor organization. Because of the meeting of the Senate to do the business of the country here in Washington, I have had to forego that opportunity, and I am here today.

I welcome this opportunity to associate myself in support of this concurrent resolution, so that I can better express what I would like to have expressed personally to my friends of organized labor in Utah and across the Nation. I am very happy to be associated in support of this resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I wish to commend the majority leader and the other Members of the Senate who are offering this resolution paying tribute to labor. As Governor of the State of Kansas, I had the privilege of working in cooperation with many leaders and members of organized labor. We had the finest of cooperation with them. I wish to commend labor for the splendid work it has done in behalf of our State and Nation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND].

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I wish to commend the majority leader for offering this resolution. I think it is very fine that our country has set aside this day of the year to honor our working people. They deserve this consideration. They have contributed greatly to the development and progress we have reached in this, the greatest Nation on the face of the earth. I salute the majority leader for having offered the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON].

Mr. MAGNUSON. I wish to associate myself with this concurrent resolution. Were we not in session today, I would be in my home State, speaking at a labor gathering in commemoration of this day. I would say just about what I have read editorially in the Washington Post of this morning. I think it states very well the happenings of the past week, and what I believe to be the opinion of Congress and all of us in regard to labor. In effect, what the editorial states is that Congress has closed some doors to corruption and arbitrary use of power, but the national interest in a strong, vigorous, and clean labor movement is as great as it ever was.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO DOGHOUSE FOR LABOR

Labor Day, 1959, finds some of the leaders of organized labor in sackcloth and ashes and others deeply confused by the events of last week. Congress not only enacted a stiff labor reform bill; it did so by overwhelming votes in both Houses. It was not merely the coalition of Republicans and southerners that ignored the protests of organized labor, but almost the entire Congress. Does this mean that the country has suddenly swung into an antilabor mood?

Despite the gloom in some labor circles, we think the question must be answered with an emphatic "no." The people have conveyed to Congress an unmistakable demand for legislation to protect the rights of individual workers, to oust racketeers from the labor movement and to curb various practices that some unions have indulged in to the detriment of the public interest. But in our opinion the support for good working conditions, high wages, the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively remains unshaken. Not for a moment did the public call for a "killer bill" against labor. Rather, the bill won landslide support because of the belief that its provisions are fair to organized labor as well as to employers and individual workers.

Some persons who have abused the great power now in the hands of labor unions are certainly in the doghouse, but not labor as a whole. Taken as a group, the United States 71 million working men and women have the highest living standard ever known. Most of them have also attained a large measure of economic and social security along with the right of voluntary association to improve their working conditions. They enjoy the rights of free expression, free movement and general participation in the political life of the country. Congress has closed some doors to corruption and arbitrary use of power, but the national interest in a strong, vigorous, and clean labor movement is as great as it ever was.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that each Member of this body may have an opportunity, within the next hour, to join in sponsorship of the resolution, if he desires, and each Member of this body, within the next hour, may have not to exceed 3 minutes to speak on the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to make some parliamentary inquiries, if I may, under that reservation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield for a parliamentary inquiry, and ask that the time taken in making it not be charged to either side.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired. Is there objection to a parliamentary inquiry being propounded without the time being charged to either side?

Without objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I state my parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. President, I am in complete accord with the sentiments of the proposed concurrent resolution. I am in such complete accord with those sentiments that I think the meaning and symbolism of the resolution should be discussed at some length. I think it is particularly fitting that on this Labor Day the Senate be allowed to discuss the importance of the free labor movement in this country as one of the great foundations of democracy, and that we should not be limited in time to 3 minutes.

So my first parliamentary inquiry is, If the Senator from Oregon should object to the request of the Senator from Texas in its present form and if the Senator from Texas would ask only to consider the concurrent resolution as proposed, would the offering of the resolution be subject to debate in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MORSE. Therefore, Mr. President, because I should like to have the resolution before the Senate, because I am in complete accord with the objectives of the resolution, and because I should like to afford myself an opportunity, and anyone else in the Senate who would like to have it, an opportunity to discuss the resolution in full, I object to the request in its present form.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I shall attempt to meet the viewpoint expressed by the Senator. I do not know how much time each Senator would desire to discuss the resolution, but I ask unanimous consent that each Senator be permitted to address himself to the resolution for not to exceed 15 minutes, and that the senior Senator from Oregon be permitted to address—I ask that each Senator be permitted 15 minutes on the resolution.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall object, I want to say that I feel that on a matter as important as this my majority leader ought to return to the protection of what I think is a very important right in the Senate; that is, unlimited debate. Therefore, I shall object to any offering of this resolution with any time limitation placed upon it whatsoever. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The objection is heard.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the country will know the sentiments expressed by most of the Members of the Senate. I think most people recognize that we have asked that a reasonable time be afforded each Senator, but we do not want to give an opportunity for delaying tactics, when we have very important bills which have to be considered.

I commend the Senate for the action it took the last 2 days of last week notwithstanding the parliamentary tactics which were employed. We met and reported two very important bills from committees, the roads bill and the E- and H-bond bill. We passed the roads bill. We passed two conference reports, on the independent offices appropriation bill and the military construction appropriation bill. We voted on the President's veto of the housing bill, and we made substantial progress in regard to the very important proposed legislation known as the extension of Public Law 480.

I am going to ask the Senate, under the unanimous-consent time limitation to which we have agreed, to remain in session until midnight this evening, if necessary, in an attempt to complete action on the extension of Public Law 480.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. What is the present legislative situation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to paragraph (q) of the committee amendment, page 3.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Has all time been consumed on that amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The opposition time of 15 minutes, under the control of the Senator from Minnesota, is still remaining.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me 10 minutes, or 8 minutes?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I would be happy to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, there is a request I would like to make.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I will yield, provided I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Do I correctly understand that the Senator from Montana wishes to speak on a matter other than the particular item in the bill in issue?

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is correct, although it is tied in indirectly with the item in the bill.

Mr. MORSE. I only wish to say that, so far as I am concerned, I would be willing to ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Montana have 10 minutes, without the time being charged to either side.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I make that unanimous-consent request for 10 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? Without objection, the Senator from Montana is recognized for 10 minutes.

LAOS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, according to press reports, the situation in Laos is growing more serious by the hour. Guerrilla activity is spreading throughout northern Laos. Lao rebels, supported and probably led by Communist cadres from North Vietnam, are isolating and overrunning government garrisons in the Provinces of Sam Neua and Phong Saly. There are even reports that a battalion or two of regular Vietminh forces from North Vietnam are participating directly in the military engagements.

I would point out that there are two distinct aspects to this crisis, from our national point of view. It will be well to keep the two clear and distinct in our thinking as the crisis intensifies.

In the first place, there is an international aspect, a United Nations aspect. The Lao Government has charged North Vietnam with aggression. It has appealed to the United Nations for support—for a military force—to repel the aggression.

We are members of the United Nations. We—along with other members—have an obligation to see to it that this charge of the Lao Government is aired immediately and completely. The place to do it, in the first instance, is in the Security Council. If that body is deadlocked by the veto, on the basis of precedent, the question should be carried to the General Assembly.

The United Nations cannot, indeed, it must not, ignore a formal charge of aggression regardless of where it originates. Every member of the Organization—and Laos is a member—is entitled to full and impartial consideration in a matter as serious as the charge of aggression. It does not matter that the nation is small, weak and remote.

Out of U.N. consideration should come measures to get at the facts, promptly and accurately, in Laos and to bring about a halt to the fighting.

I realize that it is not going to be easy for the United Nations to devise these measures. In the first place, Laos is a remote land with the most primitive means of communication; the scene of the present difficulties, as I recall personally from three visits to Laos in the past, is isolated, rugged, jungle terrain.

Further, the government which stands accused of the aggression, North Vietnam, is not a member of the United Nations and is not likely to respond eagerly to peaceful efforts by that body to get at the facts and stop the fighting; nor is the nation, Communist China, which stands behind North Vietnam and which may well have inspired and underwritten the action in Laos.

Finally, there are obscure and complex factors in the Lao political situation itself. Guerrilla warfare and palace revolutions have been going on intermittently in Laos for a decade or more. In 1955, under the Geneva Accords on Indochina, a truce was arranged between the rebels who held the northern provinces of Sam Neua and Phong Saly and the Royal Lao Government. This truce was preserved between 1955 and 1958 by the presence of a peace team consisting of detachments from Canada, Poland and India. In the latter year, the team was withdrawn at the insistence of the Lao Government after the latter had reached a political agreement with the rebels. It should be noted that the present military outbreak in northern Laos was preceded by the breakdown in the political agreement at the capital in Vientiane.

Most recently, Tiao Savang Vathana, Crown Prince of Laos, has assumed a regency in Laos. For years, he has properly sought to remain aloof from the obscure intrigues and palace politics which afflict the country. Now, in the emergency, he has been asked to assume power in place of his long-ailing father. Prince Savang is an able and intelligent and courageous man. He may yet succeed in reconciling the various Lao factions in the interest of the nation. Certainly, he should be given every encouragement if he seeks to do so.

Those, then, are the principal factors which will make the task of getting the facts on this situation and acting on them very difficult for the United Nations. I do not presume to anticipate the actions of that organization in the matter. It seems to me, however, that the best approach to this situation, in the first instance, is through the Security Council, if that is at all possible. It seems to me, further, that an unwillingness on the part of any member of that organ to cooperate, at least in seeking to establish machinery for getting the facts on this charge of aggression, would cast the gravest doubts on its peaceful intentions.

I would say, further, that if there is any opportunity for a prompt determination of the facts and the devising of a satisfactory, peaceful settlement, a great deal depends on India. That country can play an immensely helpful role in this situation, if it can spare the effort, in the light of the grave developments on its own border.

If the situation continues to deteriorate in Laos and the United Nations is unable to act in a constructive fashion, there is still another international recourse open to the Lao Government. It can appeal to the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization. The nations of that organization, and we are one of them, have a deep concern in the matter since they have committed themselves to respond to a request from Laos for aid against aggression in accordance with their constitutional processes.

I believe that it is highly desirable for the SEATO nations to meet now to determine what courses they may follow in the event an appeal from Laos is forthcoming. But I wish also to emphasize that in my opinion, the administration will be well advised to go slow on any direct military involvement of this Nation in Laos. Military force ought to be the last resort in international disputes, not the first.

The best hope for a peaceful solution of the difficulty in Laos, as I have already tried to indicate, I believe lies in the fullest support of the political efforts of Crown Prince Savang within Laos, in the fullest utilization of the peacekeeping recourses of the United Nations, and the conciliatory capacities of India.

If the current crisis in Laos raises serious international questions, it also raises equally grave questions as to the administration of the foreign policies of this Government. I think we have got to ask ourselves these questions: First, what effect the vast increase in American officials in Laos from a total of two State Department people in 1953 when I first visited the country to the hundreds at the present time, representing numerous executive agencies—what effect this sprawling growth has had on the development of our policies, our relations and our deepening involvement with that country; second, what influence, if any, this administration or any branch of it, may have exercised in connection with the withdrawal of the Geneva truce team before a stable, peaceful, political situation had been created in Laos; third, how is it, that after spending hundreds of millions on aid to Laos, after being assured by the executive branch just a short time ago that this aid had built stability and kept out the Communists, the defense of the entire country can be so rapidly undermined by a battalion or two of Vietminh forces? This development, coming as it does, just a few months after the adverse report of the Hardy Committee on the aid program in Laos, highlights again the concern which has been expressed over and over again in Congress on shortcomings in the administration of foreign aid.

Most of all, we have got to ask ourselves, How have we been making the policy and administrative decisions on Laos? On September 4, I suggested to the Senate that "the power to interpret the will of the Nation in respect to our vast and complicated relations with the rest of the world has been diffused through the enormous labyrinth of the executive branch of the Government. The power to decide has been scattered and diluted to the point where it has become virtually impossible to fix responsibility."

Is that what has happened in Laos? Has it, in fact, been the President and the Secretary of State who have made the decisions on Laos in the past few years? Or, do we have, in that country a policy based on executive agency accommodation, with the Defense Department, the ICA, the CIA, or whatever, each putting in an oar and the State Department trying to guide the boat while it does not really have the power to control the rudder?

Regardless of what has happened in the past, this administration had better see to it that in the present delicate situation, it is the President and the Secretary of State and the Department of State—they alone—and no one else in the executive branch who calls the shots and makes the decisions and that the rest of the executive branch falls in line. Otherwise we are going to be in grave danger of stumbling into what may be an avoidable military involvement.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I wish to express my full support of actions taken up to this time by the Department of State in trying to bring about an alleviation of the present situation in this unhappy, this remote, this faraway country.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, as one who has visited Laos briefly, and has studied and watched the situation ever since that visit, I agree with the Senator from Montana that this is a serious situation. It involves Cambodia, Thailand, and South Vietnam. It certainly should have the attention of the highest authorities of our Government.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MORSE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, has laid down a set of principles with regard to the protection of freedom in that area of the world where freedom is under such severe attack with which I wish to associate myself. I think the Communists are going to find the American people united in support of the State Department and in support of the principles just enunciated by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WILEY subsequently said: Mr. President, after hearing the fine statement this morning by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], I caused to be prepared a short statement on the same subject, as follows:

Mr. President, as you know, the United Nations Security Council is scheduled to meet this afternoon on the request of Laos to send U.N. observers to that strife-torn country.

The United Nations, I hope, will take expeditious action upon the request of this beleaguered nation.

Yesterday, the United States declared its support of the Lao plea for a U.N. observer mission.

The position, which I believe is a sound one, again represents our willingness to assume obligations as a responsible member of the United Nations Charter.

We can, of course, expect the Communists to attempt to throw roadblocks in the path of any effort to effectively investigate the violation by them of the territorial integrity of Laos.

However, every effort must be made to not only point the finger of blame at the Communists—where it belongs—but also to develop more effective machinery for dealing with this kind of aggression.

At this time, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the text of the statement issued by the State Department on the Lao situation.

In addition, I request to have the State Department comments followed by a statement by myself issued yesterday. The release cites the Lao crisis as one more bit of evidence on the need for an effective United Nations police force to curb such violations and to provide for a more secure peace.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times]

U.S. STATEMENT ON LAOS

WASHINGTON, September 5.—Following is the text of the State Department statement today on Laos:

"The United States as a member of the United Nations will fulfill in good faith the obligations assumed by it under the charter. One of these obligations is to take appropriate measures in support of the charter. To this end the United States will support United Nations consideration of the Royal Lao Government's appeal.

"The U.S. Government has repeatedly announced its strong support of the Royal Lao Government in its determination to resist Communist efforts to undermine the security and stability of Laos.

"On August 26, 1959, the United States announced that, in response to specific and urgent requests from the Lao Government for improving its defense position, additional aid was being authorized to permit emergency increases in the Lao Army and militia to cope with the threat posed to that government by the Communists.

"The United States announced at the same time that it would continue to support reasonable approaches to achieve a peaceful solution of the current situation in Laos.

"NORTH VIETNAMESE ACCUSED

"On August 30 a strong attack from the northeast was launched against Royal Lao army units in the northeastern border area of Sam Neua Province. The small Lao forces in this province had been reinforced and had begun to push back an earlier Communist salient which had extended about 50 miles from the North Vietnam border in an area northwest of the town of Sam Neua.

"The August 30 attack against the northeastern border area provides further evidence of the active support of Communist rebel forces within Laos from Communist North Vietnam. The attack could not have been supported nor coordinated without such outside collaboration.

"It is now clear that the Communist bloc does not intend to permit the sovereign Lao Government to remain at peace. The Communist bloc apparently intends to foment and direct a rebellion within Laos and to give extensive support to the attempt to seize important areas and otherwise to prevent the establishment of those peaceful conditions necessary to implement basic economic and social programs.

"In short, the Communist intervention is apparently aimed at preventing the Lao people from realizing their just hopes for a better life.

"EVIDENCE OF INTERVENTION

"That outside Communist intervention exists is demonstrated by:

"1. The assistance evidently being received by the Communist forces within Laos, including supplies and military weapons that could be provided only from Communist territory.

"2. The false—and ridiculous—Communist propaganda emanating simultaneously from Hanoi, Peiping, and Moscow to the effect that the Lao Government has been instigated by the United States to 'stir up a civil war' within its boundaries.

"3. The continuing flow from Moscow, Peiping, and Hanoi of propaganda and false information about the situation in Laos aimed at confusing world opinion and stating that the United States is using Laos as a military base.

"4. The fact that the military outbreak in Laos has followed conferences in Moscow and Peiping between Ho Chi Minh and Soviet and Chinese Communist leaders and also conferences in Moscow between two members of the North Vietnam Politburo and Deputy Prime Minister Anastas Mikoyan.

"The latest attack upon the Lao Army in Sam Neua Province has resulted in an appeal by the Royal Lao Government for United Nations assistance. It is appropriate that this matter be thus brought to the world's attention.

"It is obvious that a further augmentation of the invading force or continued material support thereof by Communists in North Vietnam will require a major change in the nature and magnitude of the Royal Lao Government's need for support.

"The United States is confident that the free world would recognize such a new danger to peace and would take the action necessary. For its part, the United States supports that view."

LAO CRISIS CREATES MORE EVIDENCE FOR NEED OF U.N. POLICE FORCE

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican of Wisconsin, ranking Republican of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, today cited the Lao crisis as one more bit of evidence on the need for a United Nations police force.

"Around the world, the Communists—in Laos, on the India-China border, and elsewhere—continue to engage in infiltration, attempts at subversion, and outright aggression, to attempt to accomplish their goal of world conquest.

"The establishment of an effective U.N. police force, I believe, could do much to control and/or prevent such situations," Senator WILEY said.

"Overall, the nations of the world must increase their efforts to encourage respect for territorial integrity, international law, adherence to high standards of conduct, and more particularly, to discourage such infiltration and aggression as is now occurring in Laos.

"Until enforcement machinery is provided, however, we can—in view of the Communists persual of their goal of world domination—expect this kind of outlawry to continue to create threats to the security of countries.

"We recall that, in 1958, the U.S. Congress, by resolution, expressed its support for establishment of such an international force. Unfortunately, opposition by the Soviet Union has, until now, prevented the creation of such a force within the United Nations.

"The Lao crisis—as well as the India-China border dispute and other such Communist-inspired crises—furnish additional evidence of the need for establishment of an effective U.N. police force to curb such violations and provide for a more secure peace," Senator WILEY concluded.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we have the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills, petitions, and memorials, and the transaction of other routine business. For the convenience of all the membership, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a limitation on statements not to exceed 3 minutes.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MORSE. Is the Senator from Oregon to understand that this request——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we have the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills, petitions, and memorials, and the transaction of other routine business with the limitation on statements of not to exceed 3 minutes. The exact form of the request is found in the RECORD each morning when the Senate assembles. I make that same request.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Let me assure the majority leader that I understood the request. I was raising a parliamentary inquiry about the request. It is my understanding——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have order? I cannot hear the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. MORSE. Is my understanding correct that if the request is granted, then the morning hour called for by the request will be conducted outside of the unanimous-consent agreement with regard to the pending business before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MORSE. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the regular morning hour, this being Monday, it be in order to call the calendar for the consideration of measures to which there is no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I object.

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON REDUCTION OF NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES—FEDERAL EMPLOYMENT AND PAY

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. EASTLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Harold K. Wood, of Pennsylvania, to be U.S. district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

By Mr. DODD, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Henry J. Friendly, of New York, to be U.S. circuit judge for the second circuit.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HUMPHREY:

S. 2651. A bill to authorize the President of the United States to present, in the name of Congress, a Medal of Honor to Herman Miller; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. DODD (for himself and Mr. KEATING):

S. 2652. A bill to strengthen the internal security of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PERMANENCE OF PROVISIONS OF REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1949—AMENDMENTS

Mr. GRUENING (for himself and Mr. BARTLETT) submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (S. 1474) to make permanent the provisions of the Reorganization Act of 1949, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

EXEMPTION OF CERTAIN ASPECTS OF DESIGNATED PROFESSIONAL TEAM SPORTS FROM ANTITRUST LAWS—AMENDMENTS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the sports bill (S. 2545) reported last week by the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee to the Committee on the Judiciary, is completely inadequate because it does not include baseball. True, it represents a step in the right direction of eliminating the present confused antimonopoly status of professional football, basketball, and baseball. As far as those three games are concerned, the anamoly resulting from various Supreme Court decisions will be removed.

But the fatal flaw in this bill is that it does not do the whole job, because it does not extend congressional ratification to the Supreme Court's rulings concerning baseball and the antitrust laws. I do not intend to stand by while baseball, which has been the subject of extensive hearings stretching over a number of years, is shortchanged in this way. There has been no evidence adduced by witnesses before Congress or by staff studies which would justify leaving our national pastime out of any legislation which is enacted.

I particularly regret this action by the Antitrust Subcommittee because it comes at a time when baseball is in an exciting but delicate transition stage. The onset of a third major league has delighted sports fans all over the country. Wonderful progress is being made toward that goal.

Sufficient ground work has been laid for Branch Rickey, the elder statesman of baseball, to consent to take over the tiller and guide the destiny of the Continental League as its president. Ford Frick and organized baseball have pledged to cooperate with the third league as it organizes.

It would be tragic, in my view, if this important work were in any way impeded by shortsighted action in Congress. Clarification of baseball's status under the antitrust laws by congressional action would be a significant contributing factor in permitting the third major league movement to go forward without the uncertainty of further scrutiny by Congress.

In order to prevent shaking the confidence of investors in the Continental League, in order to assure all concerned that Congress will not unduly tamper with the operations of organized baseball which have proved themselves over the years, and generally to stimulate progress toward the goal of a third big league, the omission of baseball from the proposed antitrust-sports bill must be corrected. In order to rectify this serious flaw, therefore, I shall offer an amendment to include baseball within the coverage of the measure when it comes before the full Judiciary Committee.

I am hopeful that an objective analysis of the whole situation, both in terms of the responsibilities of Congress with regard to the antimonopoly statutes and our obligations to the millions of sports fans of America, will result in making this a much better bill before it is enacted by the Senate and House. By adding baseball to the bill, and perhaps making other changes, we will be completing well a job which has long confronted Congress. And incidentally, we will be speeding the day when major league baseball can be witnessed by many more fans, including my constituents in the New York City area, who will enjoy the addition of a second big league club to that area.

For that purpose, I shall offer, when the bill comes to the full committee, an amendment to include baseball in the provisions of the bill.

I submit for printing, under the rule, this amendment, and also two other amendments dealing with the right to operate in specified geographic areas, and one to deal with the telecasting provisions of the bill as reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1954, RELATING TO ESTATE-TAX MARITAL DEDUCTION TO WIDOW'S ALLOWANCE OR AWARD—AMENDMENT

Mr. GORE submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (H.R. 2573) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to the application of the estate-tax marital deduction to widow's allowance or award, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1949, AS AMENDED—AMENDMENTS

Mr. GRUENING (for himself and Mr. BARTLETT) submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (H.R. 5140) to further amend the Reorganization Act of 1949, as amended, so that such act will apply to reorganization plans transmitted to the Congress at any time before June 1, 1961, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

INTEREST RATE ON SERIES E AND H U.S. SAVINGS BONDS—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, earlier in the morning hour I discussed the possibility of offering an amendment to H.R. 9035, the purpose of which would be to lift the ceiling on long-term Treasury bonds, open-market bonds, as well as on savings bonds.

I submit an amendment to accomplish that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. BUSH also submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to House bill 9035, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to House bill 9035, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FIRST BUSINESS AGREEMENT DRAWN IN AMERICA

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, we in Massachusetts are proud of the contribution we have made to the American free enterprise system. The town of Bourne, Mass., is observing its 75th anniversary this year by recalling one of the earliest contracts signed within the borders of the United States.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD what is believed to be the first business agreement drawn in America. It was drawn before the 6th of November 1627.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, what is the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The unanimous-consent request is to insert at this point in my remarks a copy of the first business agreement drawn up in America, which was an agreement drawn up between the Plymouth Colony on the one part and William Bradford and others on the other part. The record shows that it was drawn before November 6, 1627.

Mr. MORSE. I assure the Senator from Massachusetts that the only reason I made my inquiry was that I did not hear what he had said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the agreement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COPY OF THE FIRST BUSINESS AGREEMENT DRAWN IN AMERICA

This contract, given verbatim in Gov. William Bradford's "Letter Book" represents the commencement of orderly, well organized business in America. Because of this and the worldwide development of our great industries, and the creation on this side of the Atlantic of the world's financial center, this little trading post at once assumes a unique position of national historic interest. From it, as one of the very earliest of the important outposts, in New England, and hence in America, has developed the world commerce of our Nation.

"Articles of agreement between the Colony of Plymouth in New England, on the one party, and William Bradford, Capt. Miles Standish, and Isaac Allerton, and such others as they shall take as partners and undertakers with them, on the other party, made the ——— (from an entry in Plymouth Colony records this date was before November 6, 1627):

"First. It is agreed and covenanted betwixt the said parties, that they, the said William Bradford, Capt. Miles Standish, and Isaac Allerton, and such others as they shall take unto them, have undertaken, and do by these presents covenant and agree to pay, discharge, and aquit the said colony, of all the debts, both due for the purchase, or any other way belonging to the same, at the day of the date of these presents.

"Secondly, the avovesaid parties are to have and freely enjoy the pinass the boat at Manament, and the Shallop, called the base boat. With all other implements to them belonging, that is in the store of the company: with all the whole stock of furs, pelts, breads, corn, wampampeak hatchers, knives, etc., that is now in store, or any way unto the same upon account.

"Thirdly, that the avovesaid parties have the whole trade to themselves, their heirs, and assigns, with all the privileges thereof, as the said colony doth now, or any use the same; for 6 full years to begin the last of September next ensuing.

"Fourthly, in further consideration of the discharge of the said debts every several purchaser, doth promise, and covenant yearly to pay, or cause to be payed, to the abovesaid parties, during the full term of said 6 years, 3 bushels of corn, or 6 pounds of tobacco. At the undertaker's choice.

"Fifthly, the said undertakers shall, during the aforesaid term, bestow 50 per annum in hose and shoes, to be brought over for the colony's use, to be sold them for corn, at 6 shillings per bushel.

"Sixthly, that at the end of the said term of 6 years, the whole trade shall return to the use and benefit of the said colony, as before.

"Lastly, if the aforesaid undertakers, after they have acquainted their friends in England with these covenants, do (upon the first return) resolve to perform them, and undertake to discharge the debts of the said colony according to the true meaning and intent of these presents, then they (upon such notice given) to stand in force, otherwise all things to remain as formerly they were, and a true account to be given to the said colony, of the disposing of all things according to the former order.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, Bourne will be celebrating at the Aptuxcet Trading Post, a replica of the original. The agreement setting up the trading post and giving certain of their number control of the trade there was written and signed by the colonists of Plymouth Plantation at the plantation, 20 miles distant. Its purpose was to pay off the huge debt still owed to the London backers of the Mayflower expedition, to transport more of their brethren to Plymouth, and to bring profit to the colony.

This agreement was the first business contract drawn up and signed in America and established Aptuxcet's claim in Bourne as "the birthplace of American capitalism."

Today we may take renewed faith in the ability of our free enterprise system to solve the problems confronting it. As it has brought us to the most advanced Nation in the world, so it may continue our progress.

TRIBUTE TO LABOR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President on behalf of myself, the acting minority leader [Mr. KUCHEL], the Democratic whip [Mr. MANSFIELD], and the chairman of the minority conference [Mr. BRIDGES], I submit the concurrent resolution to which I previously referred, congratulating American labor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 76) was read, as follows:

Whereas American labor has raised its standards of productivity to heights unequaled in world history; and

Whereas the efforts of American labor have brought to this country a standard of living that has no parallel; and

Whereas American labor has served the Nation in peace and war; and

Whereas American labor has been a bulwark of freedom; and

Whereas the first Monday in September is traditionally set aside to commemorate the services of working men and women to our Nation; Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress does hereby express its deep realization and appreciation of the basic role that labor plays in our economy and of the contributions that American working men and women have made to America's well-being.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that any Senator who wishes to associate himself with the concurrent resolution be permitted to do so.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MORSE. I understand that the majority leader has sent to the desk a so-called labor resolution, asking that it lie on the table for the signatures of other Members of the Senate who wish to sign it, but that he is not asking for consideration of the concurrent resolution at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MORSE. He only seeks to have it placed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct. I submit the concurrent resolution and ask that it lie on the desk for the remainder of the day, in order that any other Senators who desire to do so may join in cosponsorship.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MORSE. Before the concurrent resolution could be considered it would have to be taken from the desk; and after it is taken from the desk and considered it will be subject to debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MORSE. I have no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator.

INTEREST RATES ON GOVERNMENT SECURITIES

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I should like to give notice to the Senate that when the bill—H.R. 9035, I believe—comes up, dealing with the interest rate on series E and H U.S. savings bonds, I intend to offer amendments to eliminate the ceiling on the open market bonds of the Treasury.

Having studied this matter for months, and especially over this weekend, I have come to the conclusion it is of vital necessity to this Government, and to the whole world, that the Treasury's hands be united in connection with the management of the debt. If we fail to do that, we shall make a mistake which may be catastrophic in its consequences.

I intend to discuss this matter rather extensively with the Senate, and offer amendments which will have the effect of eliminating the interest ceiling on long-term bonds. I want all Senators to be on notice I intend to do that. Of course, if some member of the Finance Committee wishes to offer the amendments, I would defer to him, as a matter of protocol and as a matter of senatorial privilege; but unless that is done, I intend to do it myself.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. If I may yield, I will yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. It is my understanding that there was an understanding on both sides of the aisle that the interest rate on E- and H-bonds would be permitted to be increased, but that the matter which the Senator has said he intends to raise would not be seriously advanced. If the Senator does seriously advance that proposal, I shall offer, as a substitute, a declaration of policy by the Congress of the United States as to the course the Government should follow, in the opinion of the Congress, in this regard.

Mr. BUSH. The Senator is always at liberty to do that. If he wants to take the responsibility to do that, I assume he is perfectly entitled to do so.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. What the Senator from Tennessee has said I think is correct. It is an absolute certainty that the bill concerning interest rates on series E- and H-bonds would not have been reported when it came out and how it came out if there had not been an understanding this other proposal was not to be made. I suggest that the Senator not talk about responsibility——

Mr. BUSH. Who had the understanding?

Mr. ANDERSON. The members of the committee.

Mr. BUSH. Nobody had any understanding with me.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BUSH. I made the statement that I would offer the amendments to which I have referred in response to an inquiry by the Senator from Pennsylvania several days ago on the floor of the Senate. He asked me that question point blank.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator has a perfect right to do it, but do not say the Senator from Tennessee would do something on his own responsibility. The Senator is opening up the subject of the financial policy of the United States, and that involves a 2- or 3-week debate. If he wants it to come now, let it come. It is perfectly satisfactory with me. If he is interested in changing the interest rate on E- and H-bonds, he will not offer that proposal. If he is not interested in so doing, he is taking the exact course to make it impossible to change the interest rate on those bonds, and he knows it?

Mr. BUSH. I have no desire to debate this question for a week. I simply said I proposed to have an extensive discussion of it. That might take a day.

Mr. ANDERSON. The rest of us intend to have an extensive discussion of it also.

Mr. BUSH. Fine.

Mr. ANDERSON. We took 2,000 pages of testimony. We tried to distill it down in accordance with the lessons we learned. We ended up with 200 pages of distillation. This is a subject which requires some comment, and about which there is some controversy. This is not the way to handle it. I am glad the Senator has served notice on us.

Mr. BUSH. I thought it was only fair.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is fair. It is only fair to serve notice on the Senator that this will be a long discussion any time we start it.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, may I reply?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me I might be able to clarify this in a moment.

Mr. BUSH. I will be glad to yield in just a second.

I should like to say I was asked by the minority leader whether I wanted to do this. I stated I did not want to agree to any unanimous-consent agreement which would foreclose a full discussion of this issue. The minority leader asked me how much time I thought I would require, and I said no less than 1 hour on the bill, and that I had an amendment which might take a half hour. The Senator asked me whether an hour's time on the amendment, divided half and half, would be satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON from Texas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. The Senator asked me about the time on the amendments and I said I would agree to 1 hour, to be divided half and half.

Therefore, I have not stated any proposition which is going to delay the Senate unduly on an issue which is the most pressing issue before us this year, in my judgment. Other Senators may consider other issues are more important.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if the Senator has completed, I wish to make a brief statement now.

Mr. President, we face a practical problem in regard to what legislation is going to be considered and how long it will take and when we expect to complete the session.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator speak louder?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I cannot hear the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask Senators to move closer. I am talking about as loud as I can talk.

We do not expect to seek any unanimous-consent agreement on the E- and H-bond bill, if the E- and H-bond bill is called up by motion.

After talking to the authorities in the administration—and I will say in very high places—it was pretty generally concluded by the leadership on both sides of the aisle, in both bodies, that no affirmative action could be taken on the entire administration proposal this session. It was felt, I think even by the administration and by the leadership on both sides of the aisle, in both Houses, that it was better from the administration point of view to get a part of a loaf, rather than no loaf at all.

I am in a position to say that in my opinion the Senate will pass the proposal regarding the E- and H-bonds. That is purely a personal opinion. To go beyond that I think would endanger the entire proposal. The minority leader has concurred in that opinion, after surveying his side of the aisle.

I have said to many people that while I expected the administration proposal would be offered and discussed, I did not expect that it would be adopted or that a substantial number of Senators on either side thought it could be adopted. I will say further that I have been assured that if there were a possibility of its adoption the whole proposed legislation would be set aside.

I have made a genuine and earnest attempt to get consideration of the E- and H-bond matters, even to the extent of recessing the Senate time and time and time again to get the bill out of the committee. I am going to make an earnest attempt to bring the bill before the Senate, for the Senate to consider the bill on its merits. If an attempt is made to load the bill down with other amendments, I am going to make a motion to table those amendments. I have been assured of the support of the minority leader in that regard. If the amendments are not tabled, Mr. President, I am going to join with other Members of the Senate to see, if we can, that no legislation is enacted in that field.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think good faith requires that course of action.

I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ANDERSON. The reason I raise the question is this: The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] introduced at yesterday's meeting of the Senate Finance Committee the resolution with reference to the general financial policy and the need for the Federal Reserve Bank to work with Congress and the Treasury. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] has very strong feelings in that matter.

I am not trying to misquote the Senator from Tennessee, but I believe he sympathized strongly with the Senator from Louisiana, and when the roll was called in our committee the Senator sat shaking his head, and finally he said, "I have to vote 'no,' although that is not my true sentiment. I want to help get the bill through Congress, and therefore I vote 'no'." If I have misquoted the Senator from Tennessee, he may correct me.

There were Senators on that committee who voted against a formal declaration of fiscal policy on the plea that we should get the bill to the Senate. If the Senator from Connecticut wants to open up the subject, I assure him the declaration of policy and other similar matters might come in.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am under a time limitation. I want the Senate to know that I am not going to make a motion to consider the E- and H-bond bill, reported by the committee, until in my judgment we have sufficient votes to pass that bill in its present form. I thought I had that assurance.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I believe I have it now. If I can do that and take that step, I will do it. If I cannot, then it will be somebody else's responsibility.

I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Finance I wish to concur in the statement of the majority leader. I plead with my colleague from Connecticut not to offer the amendment. While we have no definite commitments, I assume, in the Finance Committee, this is my personal feeling and I will support the Senator on that basis. I sincerely hope the Senator from Connecticut will not bring up the matter. I agree with the Senator in principle, but this is not the time to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from Kansas. I have no objection to it being brought up and discussed. I want all Senators to know what the facts are and what agreements have been reached. The agreements have been that we would not attempt to force through at this session the entire program, because we knew, from a practical standpoint, we could not do it.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We felt we would try to get as much of the loaf as we could. That agreement was made with the knowledge and the consent of the appropriate people in the committee and in the administration.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I would like to make my position clear. In the first place, I have no agreements.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand. I was informed of that.

Mr. BUSH. Naturally, I do not want to see the savings bonds bill lost.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand that.

Mr. BUSH. I think that would be a tragedy almost as bad as the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for 3 minutes more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUSH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I realize that the Senator spoke correctly when he said that he has the votes to stop the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not say that.

Mr. BUSH. I realize that the Senator has the votes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am going to have them before I make any such motion.

Mr. BUSH. I am sure the Senator will have them. I am sure that the votes are with the Senator to stop, to block, to kill the amendment which I am going to discuss.

I will say to the Senator, in view of what the Senator has said, I want to consider my position on this matter. I will consider the whole matter again, with a view to trying to accommodate myself to his wish that I do not press the amendment to a vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is perfectly agreeable.

Mr. BUSH. But I do feel that the Senator should not want to foreclose me from a full discussion of the fact that I wish to try to impress upon the Senate what a terrible mistake I believe it will make by not adopting the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator is a very reasonable man. I would certainly not suggest that he not offer the amendment or not discuss the amendment. We have had no understanding in that regard. We expect the Senator to offer the amendment, and we expect him to discuss it, but we do not expect the Senate to adopt it. We hope the amendment will not be pressed, if it endangers the other proposed legislation. That is the point which has been made. I can assure the Senator it would endanger the proposed legislation.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his frank discussion and his advice in this matter, which I shall consider very carefully, I promise him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MORSE and Mr. CLARK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

POSITION OF SENATOR MORSE REGARDING SINE DIE ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, under the 3-minute rule, that there be printed in the RECORD the editorial entitled "Ambushing the Senate," published in this morning's Washington Post and Times Herald, criticizing the parliamentary course of action of the senior Senator from Oregon.

I wish only to say about the editorial that the editorial——

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, may we have order in the Chamber, so that we can hear the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Oregon may proceed.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to say that the editors completely overlooked the true position of the Senator from Oregon. There is not a word in the editorial about the fact that I take the position that I consider it my duty to do what I can to prevent an adjournment of the Senate on Saturday night, September 12. I think the Senate should continue in session next week to be available to the President of the United States and the State Department to carry out any protocol they may ask us to follow in connection with the official visit, at the invitation of the President of the United States, of the Premier of Russia.

Second. The editors of the Washington Post also overlooked completely in their editorial my point, which is that I have learned from experience in the Senate that the closing days of the Senate are very dangerous days from the standpoint of a constant possibility of the passing of bad legislation by a limitation upon debate. As I said last Saturday, I think that we have gone too far in transacting business in the Senate of the United States by way of unanimous-consent agreements.

Third. The Senator from Oregon is following this course of action because he found it necessary in order to protect his parliamentary rights in the Senate, which on too many occasions, in the opinion of the Senator from Oregon, have not received the fair consideration Senators are entitled to have their rights receive.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMBUSHING THE SENATE

Senator MORSE's one-man campaign in the Senate to slow down the adjournment rush dramatizes two facts. First, Mr. MORSE's unusual ability to irritate those with whom he works. Second, the outmoded nature of the Chamber's rules, which make it possible for a single Senator to tangle the entire body in delaying snares. While his fellow Senators fume at the Oregonian's tactics, perhaps they also ought to muse a bit about the venerable rules which encrust the Chamber's legislative machinery. Mr. MORSE, it should be noted, is not using filibuster tactics; he is simply invoking various anachronistic clauses in the Senate's own hallowed writ.

Of course, to some extent any set of parliamentary rules can be used to impose delay and stall decision; that is one important purpose of procedural devices in any democratic assembly. But few sets of rules are embedded with so many lairs from which a single Member can ambush his colleagues as those which govern the Senate. As a practical matter, the Senate operates by an unspoken agreement in which the details of the rule book are ignored by unanimous consent. But no group of which Mr. MORSE is a member can count on unanimity, and in his own crusty way, the Senator has pointed to the need of reform. To be sure, nothing can be done this week, but perhaps Mr. MORSE's campaign will help to prod the Senate into action sometime during the next half century.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, while I am on my feet I should like to raise a parliamentary inquiry because I am here at this desk——

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, may I again ask for order? It is impossible to hear what the Senator is saying with so many conversations going on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend until the Senate comes to order. If Senators desire to carry on conversations, they will please retire to the cloakroom.

The Senator may proceed.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, while I am on my feet, at the pleasure and with the indulgence of the Senate, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

I am at this desk, not my own, because the majority leader requested that I come closer in order that I might hear him. I have found from experience that when the majority leader rises from his seat, very frequently he asks for Senate action——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend until the Senate comes to order.

The Senator may proceed.

Mr. MORSE. Unless one can hear the majority leader when he asks for action, one may find himself in a parliamentary situation in which he may consider that his rights have been taken away from him because of his failure to object to some agreement the majority leader has asked for.

Mr. President, I understand a ruling was made the other day by the Presiding Officer that a Senator wishing to address the Senate must rise at his own desk. Because of the situation that will probably confront us in the next few days, the Senator from Oregon would like to have an official ruling on this matter. I respectfully submit that it is a little bit ridiculous to require any Senator, whether it is the Senator from Oregon or any other Senator, to rush from his desk to a spot nearer the majority leader so that he can hear the majority leader's request and then have to rush back to his desk in order to raise any objection he may wish to raise. This is no reflection on the majority leader at all, but I raise the point in order to find out what my rights are.

My parliamentary inquiry is this: If a Senator wishes to address the Senate and transact business that he wishes to propose to the Senate, is it necessary for the Senator to be standing at his own desk? If he makes a request standing behind another desk, may he be taken off his feet by a point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that there is nothing in the rule book on that point whatever. When a Senator is recognized on the floor, he is not required to be at his particular desk.

Mr. MORSE. I did not catch the last sentence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A Senator is not required to be at his individual desk.

Mr. MORSE. If he is recognized while standing at some other desk?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If he is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. MORSE. He cannot be taken off his feet by a point of order that the Senator is not at his desk?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. MORSE. Is he entitled to be recognized if he stands at some other desk?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He is entitled to be recognized.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Chair.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With the further proviso that the Senator addresses the Chair ahead of another Senator.

Mr. MORSE. I understand. I mean, if a Senator follows the regular procedure in the Senate of addressing the Chair and no one has sought to address the Chair in advance of his request for recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MORSE. I thought it was important that we get this matter cleared up in order to avoid any possibly embarrassing situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, the parliamentary inquiry is this—and I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Oregon: In the event order is called for by the Presiding Officer, the Presiding Officer does have the power, does he not, to force every Senator to take his own seat prior to the time the business of the Senate proceeds?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that the Chair has the right to enforce order by requiring Senators to be seated. There is nothing in the rules requiring or permitting the Chair to order a Senator to his own seat.

Mr. ALLOTT. I thank the Chair. Mr. President, are we proceeding under the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are in the morning hour.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I should like to say just one thing to my colleagues, and I shall make my statement in about 1 minute.

As I look around this room—and I am sure I look about as bad as anyone else—and I see the fatigued faces of the gentlemen in this room, I say to everyone, and I say this to my good friend from Oregon, who, as far as I am concerned personally, has always been very considerate of me, we have much to accomplish this week, and there is not going to be anything accomplished by detaining the Senate beyond this week.

I hope that all of us will be forbearing. I hope that we can try to compromise our differences or work them out, because I feel that any attempt to forestall progress or any attempt to cause unnecessary delay is only going to result, in the long run, in the kind of legislation and the kind of activity which we will all regret.

I pledge, for one, that this week I shall do all that I can do to get our work done so that we can get out of here as soon as we can. Any other course is going to lead to legislation we will regret.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, under the 3-minute rule, I wish to make a brief reply to the Senator from Colorado.

I fully understand his position. I understand that his position is probably that of an overwhelmingly majority of the Senate. Nevertheless, the rules are in the rule book for the use of a Member of the Senate when he believes the course the majority is following is a course of action that is not in the public interest. It is a decision each Senator must make.

It is my judgment that if the majority takes the position that the Senate must adjourn by Saturday night of this week, it is not in the public interest to do so. Therefore, I shall take full responsibility and will stand all the costs and the political liabilities that flow from such a course of action as I shall take.

I think it is imperative that the Senate remain in session next week to proceed to consider a long list of issues involving the public interest that are pending before committees or are ready to come to the calendar or are already on the calendar. Later today I shall discuss in some detail a list of those issues.

I merely wish to say to my friend from Colorado that I am not a candidate this morning in a popularity contest in the Senate. However, I do intend to carry out my duty under the rule.

I think the public interest calls for the Senate to continue in session during next week and for whatever period of time it may take to take care of such legislation as remains to be considered.

I mention on this Labor Day particularly amendments to the minimum wage law, pending before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. There is also civil rights legislation, tax legislation, education legislation, depressed area legislation, and a whole series of important pieces of legislation which the people of this country are entitled, in my judgment, to have Congress act upon before adjournment.

I recognize that one Senator alone cannot win this fight probably in the long run against an overpowering majority here in the Senate, but it will not be the first time that I have gone down before the majority. However, I will have kept faith at least with what I think the public interest is by doing everything within my parliamentary power in the Senate to get the Senate to take action on this public business next week.

U.S. EDUCATIONAL MISSION TO RUSSIA

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, is the Senate still in the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Yesterday the U.S. Commissioner of Education released an exceedingly interesting report on education in the Soviet Union. This report was the result of a careful, on-the-spot study by a remarkably competent and qualified group of American educators teaching throughout our vast land. These educators included the U.S. Commissioner of Education and several of his top assistants; representatives of the Graduate School of Education of Harvard University; representatives of the National Science Foundation; and a number of other eminent educational authorities. As I say, this was an on-the-spot study of education in Russia. These educators went to Russia and studied the situation at firsthand.

To me this report is far more disturbing than any revelation of Soviet military might could be. It is more significant than U.S.S.R. missiles or submarines or nuclear bomb achievement. More challenging than sputnik is the central message of this authoritative report.

The most vital power resource in the world is trained and organized human intelligence. The United States of America is the leading power in the world exactly because we excel in it. We are ahead of the U.S.S.R. in trained intelligence; and, in our educational system, far ahead. But Soviet Russia has developed a grand passion for education, as this report makes clear. Our potential enemy is devoting between 2 and 3 times as large a proportion of its resources to education as we are. Her teachers are among the best paid persons in the U.S.S.R. They are competent and dedicated. The report tells us that the leading Russian slogan is "In education, reach and overreach America."

Mr. President, the first precept of victory is to know your opponent, and do not underestimate him.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks the excellent report in yesterday's New York Times by Fred M. Hechinger, and excerpts from the report of the U.S. mission on education in the Soviet Union, which also appeared in the Sunday New York Times; together with a list of the members of the mission and a table showing the administrative system of Soviet education.

There being no objection, the material referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. MISSION FINDS SOVIET EDUCATION IS GRAND PASSION—REPORT SAYS RUSSIANS STUDY TO OVERREACH AMERICA—TEAM REVIEWS TOUR

(By Fred M. Hechinger)

WASHINGTON, September 5.—An American team of school experts has found the Russians to be a people with a grand passion for education.

According to the report of the first official U.S. education mission to the Soviet Union, the Russians' leading slogan is:

"Reach and overreach America."

The report said the people of the Soviet Union are convinced that time is on their side and that through education and hard work they can win their way to world acceptance of Communist ideology.

The report, a 135-page document, "Soviet Commitment to Education," was released by the U.S. Office of Education today. It covers a 1-month tour, from May 8 to June 6, 1958, by an 11-man team, headed by Laurence G. Derthick, U.S. Commissioner of Education.

VISITED 100 SCHOOLS

The tour included visits to about 100 schools and other educational institutions. The group traveled from Byelorussia to the Urals and from the Chinese border to the Black and Baltic Seas.

In their joint report the American educators said they were convinced that the Soviet Union regarded education "as one of the chief resources and techniques for achieving social, economic, cultural, and scientific objectives in the national interest."

They found the Soviet people not only crowding schools and universities but also seeking part-time education by way of evening study and correspondence courses.

They were impressed by the national and personal sacrifices that the Russian people were willing to make for the sake of better schooling because being well educated is the key to advancement.

They are convinced that the Russians are making those sacrifices because they consider the schools as the necessities in their race for world supremacy.

Among the key observations of the mission are that:

The Soviet is channeling getween 10 to 15 percent of its national income into education, as compared with about 5 percent in the United States.

The Soviet's 1,800,000 teachers are considered members of a privileged profession, paid roughly on the level of physicians.

Soviet teachers are subjected to far more intensive study of the subjects they teach than are American teachers.

In the preparation of elementary and secondary school teachers there appears to be an increasing emphasis on solid subject matter content, with relatively less emphasis on pedagogy.

COMPARISONS AVOIDED

The report carefully avoids comparisons with the United States. But it warned that we cannot afford to be apathetic about educational developments in the U.S.S.R."

It said that "clearly the Soviet Union is bent on overtaking and surpassing us as a world power, and it proposes to use education as one of the primary means of obtaining this objective."

Not everything the American observers encountered seemed to them admirable or superior. For example:

They were critical of the method of language instruction, although they admired the extent of the language requirement.

They questioned the uniformity of the curriculum in the 10-year schools of general education. Both as to content and method they found teachers subservient to the idea that "there is just one right way to do anything in the classroom."

They found little stress on the humanities, and while superior work in music, dance, and art is being done by a small, selected group of youngsters in special schools, these areas are generally neglected in the mass-education schools.

They saw examinations used only to push students into habits of hard work, without any attempt to test aptitiudes or to encourage the cultivation of special talents.

CHANCE FOR GOOD WORK

But despite these limitations, the report warns, it would be wrong to conclude that many able students were not being given a chance to do outstanding work, even when their classroom requirements made no special allowance for this.

Students, it was found, have opportunities to work on independent projects and develop their creative ability through extracurricular activities in carefully supervised circles.

Outstanding students often are given special, personal attention by their teachers. A variety of competitive devices are used to inspire students to give their all to their studies.

In one school a classroom was dedicated to two former pupils who had been killed in World War II. Each year the class judged to be the best in the school was given the privilege of using that classroom.

There seems to be no conscious attempt to separate children according to academic ability. But those who fall behind in their studies are frequently helped by their teachers or by outstanding fellow students.

REFORM PLAN MINIMIZED

The report includes an appendix on the recently announced school reform and an analysis of that reform by William K. Medlin, specialist for Eastern Europe of the U.S. Office of Education. But the members of the team found Soviet reform plans far less radical than had earlier been believed.

In a special news conference at the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare yesterday, Dr. Derthick said that he and his staff had been startled by the original terms of the school reform.

"But after conferences with Soviet officials, we found that the changes are not going to alter the basic program substantially."

He emphatically denied that there was any reason to expect a watering down of the academic content of the Russian elementary and secondary school as a result of the reform.

TO LINK STUDY AND WORK

According to the report and to the more detailed study by experts at the U.S. Office of Education, the reform will increase the number of students who will combine study and work during the last 3 years of the 10-year school.

An indication that this is not expected to detract from academic goals is the announced intention to add an 11th year to the secondary school.

At the same time, flexibility will be added by an option to continue on a work-study basis after grade 7 or to leave school and continue academic work through correspondence courses.

Also, the ablest seventh-year students may continue the last 3 years much as in the prereform academic fashion. This would be closer to the American pattern than the Russian school had been in the past.

Actually, some members of the team feel, the major reason for the school reform is not educational. They say it is an attempt to stop the massive rush to the universities and to provide instead more skilled manpower for technology on a level that does not require university training.

RUSH TO UNIVERSITIES

In the last 4 years, the Russian 10-year schools have been turning out about four times as many qualified university candidates as the universities were able to admit.

The key to Soviet education progress is probably the tough and demanding teacher training program. It is 4 years for elementary and 5 years for secondary school. However, many of the present teachers undoubtedly have less schooling.

Dr. Medlin estimated that 5 years of Russian teacher training add up to about twice the number of classroom and practice hours as a 5-year course in the United States.

It is estimated that Soviet teacher trainees spend 40 percent of their time on preparation of their major subject, 15 percent on technological application of their speciality and 15 percent on the specific method of teaching their major subject.

The remainder is divided among general pedagogy, psychology, foreign languages, physical education and political indoctrination.

RELATIVELY WELL PAID

The report summed up the Soviet teacher this way:

"In general, teachers appear to be relatively well paid; they have very good working conditions; as a group they appear to be highly motivated and well educated professionals who are happy in their work and proud of it.

"Teachers are not overburdened with extracurricular work. Their clerical duties are minimal. Extra teachers, or tutors, are available to work with slow learners, and to assist generally as teachers' aides. Although schools in the Soviet Union meet 6 days a week, each teacher has 1 workday a week completely free."

There are striking contrasts on the Soviet education scene. There is no teacher shortage. On the contrary, too many young Russians want to enter the profession, which ranks high in esteem and equals the pay of physicians.

But because of the rapid growth of the system, there are still many double sessions. In Moscow, 27 percent of the pupils were on two shifts last year.

HOURS REMAIN LONG

The double sessions, however, do not cut the number of school hours required. The morning shift runs from 8:30 a.m. to 2 p.m. and the afternoon shift from 2 p.m. to 7 p.m.

The Soviet problems, both real and imagined, seem to range wide. Anatol Shustov, Moscow's chief education officer, was asked about his problems. He included among them the question of general versus vocational education, as well as "the need to agitate for tennis courts; they are not in the standard plan."

Enrollment in 1957–58 in all elementary and secondary schools was 30,624,900 in 214,162 schools. This includes 104,500 pupils in 456 boarding schools, which are still considered somewhat experimental.

In 1957, about 1,500,000 pupils were graduated from secondary school and 686,000 finished the lower type of labor reserve schools. Enrollment in the United States for 1959–60 puts elementary and secondary totals at 42,700,000.

CORRESPONDENCE COURSES

About 2 million Russians of varying ages are reported to be enrolled in correspondence courses that may lead to high school graduation as well as to admission to the universities.

Both correspondence courses and part-time study, often with released time from industry, are a very common Soviet practice, the report said.

CONFLICT ON MATHEMATICS

There appears to be some conflict as to the need for such academic subjects as advanced mathematics.

"Soviet officials recognize that many pupils will never use the algebra and geometry they are required to learn, but they believe that such study is good discipline and has great transfer value," the report says.

There are, however, indications that in some of the new polytechnical courses, which combine industrial work with academic study, such subjects as mathematics are taught as applied, practical tools rather than as theoretical studies.

Along similar lines, the report states:

"Pupils without the ability or talent to become scientists use the science training they receive as a base for polytechnical education, which prepares them for industrial work."

In physics, along with the conventional idea of introducing pupils to the natural phenomenon, the Soviet student must study the basic principles of production processes.

STRESS ON TECHNOLOGY

Increasingly, the U.S. mission found, the primary emphasis appears to be on the practical and technological aspects of science.

Even a statewide competition for new science textbooks made it clear that the prizes would go to works which have a bearing on the polytechnical training of the students and the formation among them of a materialistic world outlook.

About 45 percent of the pupils required to learn a foreign language selected English. About 35 percent study German and 20 percent French. A substantial number of special students also are said to study such languages as Arabic, Chinese, and Hindu.

Soviet youngsters are required to do a fair, but not a staggering amount of homework. The daily assignments vary from 1 to 4 hours, but young children are given very little.

One Soviet school director said:

"The better the teacher, the less homework is required."

NO CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

The Soviet school does not permit corporal punishment. Membership in the Young Pioneer organization is a matter of considerable status importance. So withdrawal of the student's membership is considered severe punishment.

But probably more important, the ever-present realization that education is the means toward a better and perhaps easier life is in itself both stick and carrot and decreases the customary discipline problem.

Dr. Derthick told the news conference, "Direct comparisons of the quality of education in two countries as different in goals and aspirations are difficult, if not impossible."

Soviet teaching methods and content, he said, are designed to insure that every pupil passes. Since low marks are often considered a reflection on the teacher rather than on the pupil, teachers do their utmost to get pupils to pass, either by extensive drill or by special help.

The report dealt mainly with the 10-year school. But it also contains a brief section on the universities, some special schools and kindergartens.

STIPENDS ARE CITED

"To provide the professions and trained manpower the Soviet Union needs, the state pays stipends to approximately 80 percent of the 1,100,000 full-time students in institutions of higher education," Dr. Derthick said. None of these students pays tuition.

The American team explains its reluctance to compare the Soviet and the American education systems by stressing the difference of the roles given to education by a totalitarian and a free society.

Actually, it is known that there had been some disagreement on this point in the preparation of the report. Some team members felt that an attempt to relate the meaning of the Russian findings to the American school scene would have been a valuable service and a guide in the competition for world leadership.

COMMON AIM DETECTED

One team member noted that while the systems and the societies they serve differ greatly, the ultimate aim of survival is common to both. But since the document was a team report, it was ultimately agreed that, in the main, no comparisons were to be made.

Dr. Derthick said that while he was greatly reassured by progress made in recent years in the better American schools, he was "more disturbed than ever about this country's poorer schools when he saw the tremendous contest" in the Soviet Union.

"The American schools are doing a better job than ever before," he asserted, "but because of the explosion of knowledge we have to do much better than that."

"Soviet Commitment to Education" is part of a series of studies issued by the Office of Education. It was preceded in 1957 by "Education in the U.S.S.R."

The complete "Soviet Commitment to Education" is available for 70 cents from the Government Printing Office in Washington.

EXCERPTS OF U.S. MISSION'S REPORT ON EDUCATION IN SOVIET UNION—ACADEMY OF PEDAGOGICAL SCIENCES FOUND KEY INFLUENCE IN RUSSIAN SCHOOL GAINS

FOREWORD

This is a brief report on the observations of the first official U.S. education mission to the U.S.S.R. The first mission was made possible by an exchange agreement negotiated by the U.S. Department of State and signed on January 27, 1958.

As members of the first exchange group, we spent 1 month, from May 8 to June 6, 1958, in the U.S.S.R. While there we conferred with Soviet educators and visited approximately 100 schools and other educational institutions. Our visit was returned by a group of nine Soviet educators in November and December 1958.

Our mission had two main purposes: To lay the foundation for productive cultural relations between the education agencies and institutions of the U.S.S.R. and the United States of America and to secure firsthand information on the operation and accomplishments of Soviet schools.

In the towns and cities we broke up into smaller groups, first, because in that way we were able to obtain a more comprehensive view of Soviet education and, second, because of the different interests of the various members. We were given a friendly reception in all places, and often men and women on the streets, in the theaters, and elsewhere gathered around us with questions and messages of good will.

Did we see what was really going on? We believe we did, at least in education. Visiting schools and colleges and conferring with Soviet educators were similar to such experiences in the United States except for the language barrier. Teacher and school people have many common problems the world over. We felt quite at home discussing some of the problems educators face everywhere.

In seeking firsthand information about Soviet education we focused our attention on three central education programs: The general education (10-year) school; teacher education for the general school; and technical education. We were, of course, also interested in and observed other phases of education, but because our time was limited we had to concentrate on our primary interests. In presenting our observations we, therefore, discuss the first three programs in greater detail, but to round out the picture we summarize our observations on other phases of education.

Reader cautioned

We caution the reader not to make broad and conclusive generalizations on the basis of the observations we report. The Soviet Union and Soviet education are very large entities and, as we have noted, the situation is indeed in a state of transition. We are striving in this report to contribute to the reader's understanding of the background of present Soviet education so that he may be in a better position to interpret future developments. We are convinced that it is important for the American people to examine the Soviet program closely and to keep up to date on the developments and trends in Soviet education.

We make no effort to compare the schools of the United States with those of the U.S.S.R., for we must measure the progress of each by its own separate goals. But we do emphasize that, whether we like it or not, competition has been imposed upon us by a nation of vast resources, a people of seemingly unbounded enthusiasm for self-development, governed by a ruling hierarchy which is determined to use that self-development to cast about the world the shadow of Communist domination.

To sense this issue at first hand is indeed a sobering experience. We came back deeply concerned about our poorer schools now suffering from neglect. But we returned with a new appreciation and renewed faith in the American system as reflected in our better schools, where citizens have cared enough and done enough to make the American ideal of a sound education for all come true, or nearly so.

The question is: Will we Americans work and sacrifice to extend to all of our youth the best in American schools?

L. G. DERTHICK,
Chairman of the Delegation.

I. A NATION COMMITTED

The one fact that most impressed us in the U.S.S.R. was the extent to which the nation is committed to education as a means of national advancement. In the organization of a planned society in the Soviet Union, education is regarded as one of the chief resources and techniques for achieving social, economic, cultural, and scientific objectives in the national interest. Tremendous responsibilities are therefore placed on Soviet schools, and comprehensive support is provided for them by all segments and agencies of Soviet society.

One of the leading Soviet educators told us: "We believe in a planned society, you in individual initiative. Let time tell."

Wherever we turned we heard the slogan: "Reach and overreach America." And everywhere the people seem to respond in the conviction that education, in addition to hard work and the postponement of many creature comforts is the best means of winning world supremacy.

Education reaches far beyond school-age children and youth and is eagerly sought by hundreds of thousands of full-time workers who are also full-time students; hundreds of thousands of others take correspondence courses. Many of these correspondence students also hope to qualify for university entrance. They do this because being well educated is the key to advancement. We are sure that the Soviet people anticipate the day when their present sacrifice for knowledge will bring them many rewards, but right now, as we see it, they regard good schools and universities as the necessities in their race for world supremacy.

And they have been building schools and universities at a rapid pace. Down on the borders of China where only a half century ago the people were almost 100 percent illiterate, we saw thriving schools, an impressive scientific academy, and other institutions that have reduced illiteracy and advanced knowledge to an astounding degree. From the shores of the Black Sea to remote Siberia we found the attitude summed up in the expression of a Soviet education official: "A child can be born healthy, but he can't be born educated."

There seems to be complete equality between men and women. The relationship between boys and girls in school appears to be characterized by dignity and mutual respect for each other. At each desk there is usually one boy and one girl. A professor at the University of Leningrad said: "With us, boys and girls, men and women, are partners. We are partners in education, partners in love, and partners in work."

Today, of course, education is planned, financed, controlled, and administered by the State. Even though education in the U.S.S.R. is controlled by the Government and is therefore standardized and regimented, there is some flexibility of operation. Furthermore decisions on policy, on textbooks, on teacher training, on curriculum, and on similar matters are not always made arbitrary. We found fairly widespread evidence that before making decisions on education, the Government seeks opinions from specialists at all levels of education, from teachers throughout the country, and information based on research and experience. And it seems to get willing cooperation.

Few nations or people are today more passionately committed to education than the Soviet Union and the Soviet people are. The Soviets see what has already been accomplished and are confident of the future.

II. THE ADMINISTRATIVE SYSTEM OF SOVIET EDUCATION

The fact that Soviet educational administration is centralized has often been commented upon. In outward form, however, the Soviet school system is decentralized, with 15 Republic Ministries of Education and many regional and local departments of education. The official pattern before one's eyes is therefore diversity, not uniformity; diffusion, not centralization. Uniformity in educational policies and methods is nonetheless real and is brought about by an invisible hand, and one becomes very much aware of this fact.

Educational policies (including those on science and research) and administration are controlled at three different political centers by appropriate bodies responsible for these fields: By Federal governmental agencies (ministries and bureaus), by Federal organs of the Communist Party, and by Republic bodies of both Government and party. These various centers of political authority over education are entrusted with supervising the carrying out of laws passed by the legislatures (supreme soviets) and the decrees issued by the various councils of ministers and central committees of the Communist Party in the U.S.S.R. as a whole and the 15 constituent Soviet Republics.

Primary responsibilities for the administration and operation of schools lie with the ministries of education at both Federal and Republic levels of jurisdiction and with other governmental agencies concerned with them. Table 1 shows the different levels of jurisdiction and the various agencies exercising power in education.

The Ministries of Education supply a great volume of books, magazines, and newspapers and distributes copies of them through Government bookstores.

Financing

Typical of the commitment of the Soviet Union and the Soviet people to education is the provision that is made for its support. While exact figures on the total cost of education annually in the U.S.S.R. are difficult to obtain, it is generally conceded that from 10 to 15 percent of the total national income is channeled into education of all types.

To provide the professional and trained manpower the U.S.S.R. needs as a world power, the state is financing education of many young people by paying them stipends of varying sizes, with the size fixed by the Ministry of Higher Education. The following isolated facts may give some indication of their effort and the cost.

The cost of educating a student at the university is said to be 11,000 rubles a year [1] on the average. However, at Moscow University it runs somewhat higher.

About 80 percent of the 1,178,000 full-time students in institutions of higher education receive stipends. None of the students in these institutions pays tution.

The stipends of university students usually range from 240 to 750 rubles a month (from $24 to $74) but are higher in fields such as mining and chemical engineering than in pedagogy, and with increases according to stage of progress through the university. An addtional 25 percent is granted to students with grades of excellent in all their courses.

[1] The official rate of exchange is 4 rubles to $1, but it is not an adequate measure for conversion purposes. Once inside the U.S.S.R., the rate of 10 rubles to $1 usually applies.

III. NURSERIES AND KINDERGARTENS

In the U.S.S.R. most women work outside the home. Many of them work in industrial plants. For mothers with young children nurseries (generally called crêches) are provided for the care of children from 2½ months to 3 years old.

Usually the mother brings her child to the center at 7:30 a.m. and calls for it at 5:30 p.m.

Since the Ministry of Education is not yet able to provide kindergartens for all children aged 3 to 7, children of employed mothers, especially those in industry, or children of party members, are given priority. Parents pay tuition, the amount depending on their wages and the size of their family, but the average, a ministry official told us, is from 18 to 20 percent of the cost of the service. It is estmated that parents pay about 40 percent of the food costs and the rest is paid by the state or by the sponsor. Some parents, however, pay nothing; for example, unmarried mothers, persons on pension, or persons who have been injured in industry do not pay.

Kindergartens operate on a 24-hour day, although no one teacher works for more than 6 hours.

The program for kindergarten children includes emphasis on health and physical education, moral education, respect for and experience with useful labor, clear and correct speech, music, singing, dancing, drawing and modeling. Children are taught to pay attention and to follow verbal directions. Under the heading of "moral education," emphasis is given to developing the "sense of the collective," which is basic in Communist philosophy.

IV. SCHOOLS OF GENERAL EDUCATION

The goal of public education in the U.S.S.R. according to official statements, is to produce broadly educated citizens, with the kind of cultural and prevocational background which will enable them to contribute most effectively to the growth, development and life of their country.

In an interview with us, Mr. Yevgeni Afanasenko, the Minister of Education, said: "Each pupil should be useful to the state. We do not want young people who are good for nothing. We carry out education in such a way that each pupil participates in productive work while in school. Earlier generations first worked and then studied. Our effort now is to combine study and work." The primary function of Soviet schools is, then, to train young citizens for maximum service to the state.

The Soviet system of education is built basically around the general school. In 1930 the Council of People's Commissars decreed a universal 4-year course for boys and girls starting at age 8. In 1944 the school-entering age was lowered to 7, and in 1949, 7 years of schooling was made compulsory in the cities and large rural communities.

In 1950 the general education school began to receive particular attention. Until 1958 the goal of Ministries of Education had been to make 10 years of education universally available in all areas by 1960. At the time of our visit our hosts maintained that the goal of 10 years of education had been achieved for all children in cities. Certainly there were indications of vast growth: As of 1950 there were only 1,500,000 pupils in school grades 8 to 10, and in 1956 there were more than 5 million.

The program of general education consists of 4 elementary school years and 6 secondary school years. A single unified curriculum is planned for the elementary or 4-year school, for 7-year (incomplete secondary), and for the 10-year (secondary).

The elementary school is a 4-year school, whether it exists by itself in a rural community, whether it represents the first 4 years of a 7-year school or whether these are the beginning years of a 10-year school. Children of elementary school age (7 through 10) attend classes in the same building with older pupils when such groups exist.

All general schools are coeducational, attendance is compulsory through the seventh grade, and attendance records are carefully checked. Classes for all grades are usually conducted in one building. Classes are conducted and textbooks and teaching aids are prepared in the native language of the pupils enrolled. Altogether more than 60 languages are spoken in the U.S.S.R. schools.

Schedule

The school year begins on September 1 and ends between May 20 and June 20, with a 12-day winter holiday and a 10-day spring holiday. Children go to school 6 days a week, Monday through Saturday, usually from 8:45 a.m. to 2:30 p.m., though the schedule varies for different grades and different days of the week. There are no study periods as such during the school days.

Enrollment

In 1957–58 there were 214,162 general schools of all types in the U.S.S.R., with a total enrollment of 30,624,900 students, including the 104,500 pupils in the 456 boarding schools, but excluding the 2,088,000 children attending kindergarten. Technical and other specialized secondary schools, including those offering instruction through correspondence, enrolled 2 million; and higher institutions, including those offering instruction through correspondence, enrolled approximately 2 million. More than 3,500,000 persons were studying part time in higher institutions, secondary specialized schools, general schools for young workers and collective farmers, and schools for adults. (Enrollment figures are for the fall of 1957.)

In 1957 approximately 1,500,000 pupils finished secondary school and were issued school-leaving certificates and 686,000 finished labor-reserve schools.

Curriculum

The curriculum adopted is used in all the school systems; however, some variations are permitted between rural and urban districts and in practical subjects, depending on the type of work predominant in a particular district. Literature and history courses may also be modified to include local writers and local history. Although these slight variations are permitted, it was our impression that adherence to the official curriculum was common practice.

The standard curriculum offered in the Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic schools is shown below:

Grades 1–3: Russian language and literature, arithmetic, drawing, singing, physical education, and introduction to manual training.

Grade 4: History, geography, and elementary biology—largely nature study—are added to subjects taught in grades 1 to 3.

Grades 5–10: Russian language and literature, foreign language, history, arithmetic, algebra, geometry, trigonometry, physics, chemistry, botany, zoology, anatomy, Darwinism, geography, astronomy and drafting, polytechnical training (agricultural and industrial training), drawing, singing, and physical education.

In some places children who enter the first grade have had 4 years of kindergarten training, through which they have acquired attitudes and habits that enable them to begin primary schooling immediately. They begin at once to form letters, drawing them in an exact space set off by slanting lines on ruled paper. We were told that children begin to write with pen and ink on the 10th day of school.

Mathematics, Russian language and literature, and physical education are required in all grades. Mathematics and science are particularly emphasized throughout the general school; mathematics primarily because of its relation to other fields of knowledge. Soviet officials recognize that many pupils will never use the algebra and geometry they are required to learn, but they believe such study is good discipline and has great transfer value.

Only one foreign language is required in the basic curriculum (instruction begins in grade 5 and continues through grade 10), and a pupil has a choice of the language he takes among those offered. He may, however, study a second language in an extracurricular language club. Outside the R.S.F.S.R. in non-Russian-speaking Republics, the Russian language is taught along with the native language.

In the 6 years of grades 5 through 10 all students in general schools take a total of 7,196 hours of instruction: 2,499 in the humanities, 3,009 in science and mathematics, and 578 in practical training in agriculture and industry.

Mathematics

In the 4-year primary school, the arithmetic curriculum is designed to carry Soviet children through a program covering the four operations of arithmetic—addition, subtraction, and multiplication and division—real and imaginary numbers, the metric system, the measurement of time, decimals, and the rudiments of geometry.

The mathematics course, which includes arithmetic (grades 5 to 6), algebra and geometry (6 to 10), and trigonometry (9 to 10), is particularly designed for polytechnical education. Work with calculating tables and measuring and drawing instruments is combined with work in practical projects, all of which require the application of mathematical knowledge and habits of thought. Such exercises are tied in with the program without apparent interruption to the system of teaching mathematics. Other courses are integrated with the mathematics course. For example, the drawing course is related to the geometry course through use of theorems and geometrical constructions. Principles studied in different courses are further related in polytechnical training in the school shops.

Science

Science education for Soviet children includes scientific training through in-school and out-of-school programs. It is important to distinguish between the two, but together they represent the sum total of science education in the Soviet general school.

The state pays particular attention to the education of scientific workers. It provides for their early years of scientific education and training, encourages them in various ways, and helps them develop in the science field. Pupils without the ability or talent to become scientists use the science training they receive as a base for a polytechnical education which prepares them for industrial work.

Science education for Soviet pupils begins in the kindergarten. There a groundwork for scientific habits in the observation of natural phenomena and plant and animal life is laid before they enter the general school. In the elementary grades courses in biology, chemistry, and physics are comparable to good elementary science courses in United States schools.

Physics: Natural science subjects occupy an important place in the study plan. Among the subjects of particular importance is physics, which aims at acquainting the pupil with natural phenomena and the basic principles of production processes. The phrase points up an important phase of the Soviet educational system.

In grades 6 and 7 pupils become acquainted with principles of mechanics and heat and electrical phenomena. These form the base for the studies to follow in a deeper, systematic course in physics, mathematics, chemistry, and biology. In grades 8 to 10, the principles of mechanics, acoustics, molecular physics, as well as heat, electricity, optics, and the structure of the atom are covered.

Visual demonstration and experiment are broadly applied in physics courses, particularly in laboratory work. The content of physics courses is expanded and emphasized in practical shop work with special projects in machine work and electrical technology. The out-of-class work in physics, particularly in the various technical circles, is of great importance. Such circles are designed to stimulate pupils' interest in technology, develop their construction capabilities, and equip them with practical knowledge and work habits.

Chemistry: The study of chemistry begins in the seventh grade with elementary instruction on substances and their transformation; on atomic and molecular studies and the principal laws of chemistry; on oxides and the bases of acids and salts; and on the properties of oxygen, hydrogen, the air, and water. After this, pupils prepare for a systematic course in grades 8, 9, and 10, where the work plan calls for a study of chemical elements according to their grouping in the "Periodic Table of Elements," as well as a study of their combinations.

Demonstration experiments are designed to point up the industrial aspects of the subject by emphasizing the chemical basis for obtaining substances in industrial production. For this purpose pupils do laboratory and practical work and go on excursions to local chemical production plants.

Biology: A systematic course in biology includes the study of botany (grades 5–6) zoology (grade 7), human anatomy and physiology (grade 8) and the principles of general biology (grade 9) which stresses the practical aspects of agriculture. The objectives appear to be to teach pupils the general scientific principles involved in agricultural and livestock production and to instill in them good work habits in caring for animals and plants.

Work outside of class is important in the teaching of biology. Pupils take excursions to agricultural areas and also work on a collective farm or a state farm. In grades 5 to 7 and 9, biology pupils may work with live animals in the experimental area attached to the school. At times, during their summer vacation periods, or in critical labor shortage months, such as harvestime, they may be called for agricultural work.

Astronomy: In the 10th grade an introduction to astronomy is given to present to the students a picture of the materiality of the universe and to acquaint them with the practical application of astronomy.

Polytechnical influence: The polytechnical emphasis in the general school has modified the content of physics, chemistry, biology, and mathematics. Science subjects, although important in the training of future scientists, now have the major function of establishing an educational foundation for a polytechnical system of training which prepares a large number of students for practical industrial work.

General observations: One of the state's functions in the educational field is to stimulate the publication of useful materials in science and technology. For example, a competition for the best book on science and technology produced during the period 1956–58. This contest, which was announced in September 1956 by the Ministry of Education, R.S.F.S.R., in accordance with a resolution of the Council of Ministers, was organized and managed by the state publishing house for children's literature of the R.S.F.S.R. Ministry of Education. The prizes awarded were listed as follows: three first prizes—15,000 rubles each; five second prizes—10,000 rubles each; seven third prizes—5,000 rubles each.

The objective of the competition clearly indicates the kind of subject matter desired by the state "to make possible the formation of new literary works for outside-of-the-class reading by students in science and technology, to indicate the role and significance of science and technology in the life of a person. in Socialist construction, in the fulfillment of the sixth 5-year plan, and for the development of the U.S.S.R. economy—of works which have a bearing on the polytechnical training of the students and the formation among them of a materialistic world outlook."

As indicated earlier, the emphasis on the practical and technological aspect of science and its direct application to industrial problems of production and agriculture are probably the outstanding characteristics of science teaching in the general school. Production needs or various economic determinants play an important role in the designing of the curriculum to meet the practical requirements of the state's economy.

Foreign language instruction

The quality of foreign language that we observed in the Soviet secondary schools was not very different from foreign language instruction in American high schools. However, we are greatly impressed by the extent of foreign language instruction in the secondary schools, where a foreign language, usually French, German, or English is required of every general secondary school pupil. Continued study of the same foreign language, or a second one, is required at the college or university level.

We were also impressed by what we heard of the special language schools for those planning eventually to make language an important tool or specialty, as well as the language institutes for language training at the higher levels.

Several of us observed lessons in English, French, German, and lessons in Russian to non-Russian speaking pupils—totaling 34 individual observations. The lessons in foreign languages that we observed appeared to be organized, prepared, and conducted at present with an emphasis on grammar and reading ability rather than on the linguistic or conversational approach.

Of all foreign languages, English is the most widely taught in the Soviet Union.

Polytechnical education

In 1956 the First Secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party called for an uninterrupted advance in the technique of production as a task of prime importance. He said:

"A big shortcoming of our school system is that the instruction is divorced from life to some extent; those who finish school are insufficiently prepared for practical work. The secondary school curriculum should be revised to include greater production specialization, so that boys and girls who finish the general or 10-year school have a good general education opening the road to a higher education, and at the same time are prepared for practical activity, since no small number of those leaving school will at once start to work in various branches of the national economy."

Soon after the Secretary's statement a change in the general school program was announced—a change which represents a new emphasis on polytechnical education. In Minsk, the Minister of Education of the Byelorussian Republic, told us that changes were in prospect for the curriculum of the school.

In substance the Minister said:

"Primary and secondary education are too theoretical. Pupils need practical preparation for life. The present curriculum was fine when its objective was only preparation for a higher education, but it is now realized that most graudates go to work in industry or in agriculture and the curriculum should be changed to serve them. Thus polytechnical education and preparation for work are to be combined; that is, general principles of industrial production and proper working habits will be a part of the instruction, and each pupil should be skilled in some special trade, including those who will go on to higher education. The schools are teaching plant breeding, the mechanization of agriculture, cattle breeding, construction of machines, mechanics of metals, motor-cars and tractors, and other courses related to the attainment of this new objective in grades 8 to 10, inclusive."

The Government of the Soviet Union has a number of reasons for revising its curriculum. It wants all people to have a wholesome attitude toward labor, to be able to relate theory to practice, to be prepared to do a day's productive work on the farm or in a factory. It is looking toward further industrialization of the country and will need additional skilled manpower. Furthermore, with the extension of compulsory 10-year education, larger numbers of pupils are graduating from secondary schools than can be admitted to higher institutions. (Admission to higher institutions is governed by the needs of the country for specialists. The polytechnical program provides a transition for pupils from school to work.

Homework

The maximum amount of homework is fixed by the Republic Ministries of Education. Daily assignments are made, varying from grade to grade and by number of lessons and requiring from 1 to 3½ or 4 hours to complete. No homework is assigned for Sunday.

Homework is checked daily and marked on the same five-point scale as classwork. We noticed that pupils' copybooks were done in ink, in very good handwriting.

Schools are kept open until 9 or 10 p.m., some until 11 p.m. School libraries and reading rooms are open, and it is our impression that teachers are often available to give pupils special help.

Examinations

Soviet examinations seem strange to Americans, even to those familiar with British or French systems of education. Schools in the U.S.S.R. rely on oral examinations of a rather special type, and although they use written examinations to some extent, these, too, are different from the essay examinations that we are familiar with. Furthermore, they do not use modern testing methods, which we would expect them to find particularly valuable. They use objective tests in a few psychological laboratories, but do not use them for the identification, guidance, or placement of pupils as we do in the United States. The reason seems to be that in minimizing the significance of inheritance, as compared to environment and training, Soviet leaders have found it necessary to banish the concept of the IQ and with it all tests resembling intelligence tests.

Examinations in Soviet schools are used mainly to audit achievement, since the kinds of examinations used are not really measuring instruments. Through examinations, authorities satisfy themselves that pupils have learned the minimum essentials of important courses. The aim of the Soviet educational system at the elementary and secondary school levels is to give, not differentiated education, but exactly the same education to all pupils regardless of their special abilities, and examinations are devised and administered to make sure that this is accomplished.

Another aspect of the Soviet examination system which seems strange to us is that virtually all of the students permitted to take the examinations pass. In the schools we visited it was rare to find that in the previous year a single pupil had failed his examinations.

Discipline

There are 20 rules of behavior for Soviet children, and they are enforced by the children themselves. Rewards for excellence in studies, work, and behavior as well as punishments for infraction of rules are set by the Republic Ministries of Education. Corporal punishment is prohibited. Forms of punishment permitted are, in order of seriousness: (1) Reproof by the teacher, the director, or—for more serious offenses—the pioneer leader; (2) withdrawal of a pupil's pioneer tie; and (3) denial of the privilege of working. Pupils are not disciplined for falling behind in their studies; instead they are helped by their teachers or by pupils scoring excellent marks.

Soviet teachers

More than 1,800,000 teachers are employed in schools at all levels in the U.S.S.R. and all have had some pedagogical training, at least after beginning their careers. We were told that more than 270,000 of them have been awarded medals for outstanding service or for a contribution to educational theory and practice. As members of an honored profession teachers are highly respected and well paid. Many have been elected to public office. Some are party members, some are not.

In our visits to Soviet general schools we found the teachers friendly, hospitable, and gracious in answering our questions, as they were in schools of other types. Moreover, we were impressed by their competence, seriousness of purpose, their desire to increase their skill, their evidence of affection for their pupils, and their pupils' respect for them.

Soviet educators are very much concerned with teaching methods; methods are emphasized in teacher-training institutes, in textbooks (many textbooks carry instructions for their use), in published literature and in inservice training. The emphasis is reflected in teachers' daily classwork.

Each teacher is required to work out careful plans for her lessons and have them approved by her principal. A commonly used plan calls for review of material covered, followed by presentation of new material.

The teaching we observed, the recitations we heard and the copybooks we saw indicated that there was much rote learning.

Salary scale varies

Salaries of teachers in general schools are fixed by the Republic Ministry of Education, but the scale varies according to the region and the teacher's position and years of service. Teachers in areas offering less attractive living conditions get higher salaries than those in cities and other areas usually considered attractive.

Salaries of beginning teachers are equal in general to those of doctors and engineers, and they can make extra money by increasing their teaching load or serving as group leaders in Young Pioneer circles. Merit teachers get higher salaries or a bonus. There are periodic increases, according to length of service, after 5 and 10 years. Pensions are granted after 25 years, but a teacher with more than 25 years of service who continues to work receives both pension and salary. In a general school we visited at Tashkent 12 of the teachers were receiving pensions as well as salaries, evidently because they had been asked to continue teaching after reaching retirement age.

It is difficult to compare the salaries of teachers with those of persons in industry because they are paid on a different basis; a few figures, however, will give a general idea of the teachers' relative position:

A graduate of a pedagogical institute receives an average of 670 rubles a month as a beginning teacher (depending on the region). A young beginning physician, the graduate of a 6-year medical institute, receives 600 rubles a month. A young beginning engineer receives about 800 rubles a month.

In a general school we visited in Sverdlovsk the director received 3,000 rubles a month, which, we were told, was equal to the salary of a chief in industry; the merited teacher of mathematics received 1,700 rubles a month, and an English teacher, 1,400. We were told that the average wage of a parent of the children who attended this school was 600 to 700 rubles a month. But we noted that an average worker in heavy machine industry in the Sverdlovsk area received from 1,200 to 1,500 rubles a month; skilled workers received more.

Normal teaching load

The normal teaching load for an elementary-school teacher is 24 hours a week; for a secondary teacher it is 18 hours. A young teacher may not teach less than 18 hours; all teachers may increase their salaries by increasing the number of hours they work.

All teachers work for 10 months of the year, with a 2-month vacation in the summer at regular pay. They are required, however, to spend 2 weeks in August preparing for the next school year. We polled a number of teachers in a general school in Leningrad and found that all were planning to spend their summer vacations in leisure pursuits.

V. EXTRASCHOOL ACTIVITIES

Paralleling the programs of the general schools are the programs of extraschool activities. Such activities are conducted in the afternoon after class in the school building and in special centers open throughout the day, 7 days a week, usually from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m.

VI. EDUCATION FOR THE ARTS

For children especially talented the U.S.S.R. maintains schools of music, ballet, and fine arts which provide training in these fields in addition to the general school program.

VII. PREPARATION OF WORKERS

The U.S.S.R. places great emphasis on the preparation for work in addition to general education for all in schools, higher institutions and other training facilities. For some persons preparation is a continuing process of work and study leading, it would seem, to their optimum development as workers to serve the state. Some pupils leave school before completing their secondary education. Some of them go directly to work; for these there are schools for working youth. Others enter labor reserve schools to receive training in specific occupational skills. Others enter technicums where they can complete their secondary education and at the same time acquire technical knowledge and skills. Workers under 18 years of age are employed for 7 hours a day, those over 18 years of age, for 8 hours.

We were informed that none of this education and training experience is necessarily terminal. Some of those who complete the school for working youth may go on to higher education. Some who finish labor reserve schools may, after a period of work experience, enter technicums, and some who complete technicums may be admitted to institutes. These experiences are available not only to youth but also to adults. In one school where employed workers were completing their secondary education we observed classes in which students up to 45 years of age were in attendance.

VIII. TEACHER EDUCATION

Soviet educators are in the process of achieving two major objectives that have in recent years been the concern of our own teacher educators in the United States: (1) To unify all teacher education, and (2) to bring all teacher education to a college or university degree-level status.

Teacher educators throughout the Soviet Union are now transforming the training programs of elementary-school teachers from 7 years of elementary and secondary schooling plus 4 years of normal school to 10 years of elementary and secondary schooling plus 4 years of work in a teachers college (pedagogical institute) or in a university. In the training of secondary-school teachers, they are adding 1 year of college work to a program that previously consisted of 10 years of elementary and secondary schooling plus 4 years of teachers college or the university.

In the preparation of both elementary and secondary-school teachers, there appeared to be an increasing emphasis on solid subject-matter content, with relatively less emphasis on pedagogy as such.

Soviet teacher educators consider practical work, that is—observation of teaching, student participation in the classroom situation, and student teaching—to be of the highest importance for teachers in training for both elementary and secondary schools.

The selectivity in teacher education is approximately 5 to 1; that is, out of approximately five students who apply for admission to an institution of teacher eduction, one is accepted.

IX. ACADEMY OF PEDAGOGICAL SCIENCES

Perhaps the most important influence in Soviet educational progress is the Academy of Pedagogical Sciences of the R.S.F.S.R., an institution which has no counterpart in the United States. The academy is the research, development, and resource organization that keeps the educational system moving ahead and improves curriculum and methods of teaching. It is a part of the Russian Republic, not the Soviet Union generally, but as none of the other Republics has such an academy its work is used throughout the country.

The Academy of Pedagogical Sciences has no direct relationship to the Academy of Sciences except that some persons may be members of both, and at times members work together in planning research. The Pedagogical Academy also cooperates closely with other academies, like the academies of medicine and of agriculture.

It maintains eight research institutes, seven in Moscow and one in Leningrad. The 1958 budget for support of these institutes was 44,000,000 rubles, which it received directly from the Government, although its budget is presented by the Minister of Education.

X. HIGHER EDUCATION

Although our interest was primarily in the general school, we conferred with one of the Assistant Ministers of Higher Education and visited several institutions of higher learning in addition to the pedagogical institutes mentioned earlier. These institutions are also undergoing reforms, but we were not impressed as much as in the secondary schools with the atmosphere of change and experimentation. This situation may be explained in part by the fact that the universities remain much more highly selective than the secondary schools; furthermore, they are relatively more tradition bound.

Higher education in the Soviet Union is carried on in two types of institutions: The university and the specialized institute. Specialized institutes do not enroll students in programs outside their special fields and are to be contrasted with the universities which enroll students in many different disciplines, as do universities in the United States. The Soviet organization of higher education and of economic planning tends to perpetuate this insulation from the university concept—that historic concept which brings all students, teachers, specialists, and researchers together where they may share each other's ideas and problems.

Admission: Standards and practices

In theory, anyone who wishes to enter a university or institute may do so by passing entrance examinations. Admission is based on results of entrance examinations prepared by faculties of the particular university to which students apply. The examinations are, however, much alike because each is based on what is taught in the general school. The same series of examinations are required of students applying for a particular field of study, whether it is in Leningrad or Moscow, but individual examinations differ somewhat.

During the past year 800,000 students took entrance examinations, and 85 percent of them passed.

When we asked what proportion of general school graduates go to a university or other higher institution, the assistant minister said: "All must try to receive a higher education. If a man doesn't try to develop to his utmost, he won't be satisfied."

He illustrated his point by telling us the following incident: About a year ago a group of industrial workers, some of them blacksmiths with only 10 years of education, told him that even though they were satisfied with their work, they were beginning higher education courses in literature and law to qualify as people's judges after they retired.

XI. THE ACADEMY OF SCIENCES

To several members of our delegation, the most dynamic element in Soviet education and technology appeared to be the institution called The Academy of Sciences. By sciences, Soviet educators mean all branches of knowledge—the humanities, the social sciences, and the natural sciences.

This institution, the Academy of Sciences, is the means for broad subsidization of brainpower by the State on a scale beyond any promotion of basic research that we had known before. Talented persons, who have proved their worth through productive research, are virtually given an income for life and a great deal of latitude to conduct their research. The degrees of freedom doubtless vary with subject fields, but there appeared to be no question of practically unlimited financial support for their research activities.

It was of special interest to us to note the virtually unlimited support for basic research that the Soviet Union is providing through the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences and the Republic academies. Apparently the Soviet Government considers basic research to be the most practical investment it can make. This attitude along with the high prestige accorded brainpower in the Soviet Union, makes the Academy of Sciences the most powerful scientific institution that many of us have ever known.

XII. CONCLUSION

In retrospect, the strongest impressions we retain of our visit to the schools of the U.S.S.R. include the zeal of its people for education and the rapidly increasing degree of educational opportunity.

We have avoided comparisons between our educational system and that of the Soviet Union because, as we have stated, the objectives of education in the two countries are so different as to make comparisons misleading.

The Soviets educate their citizens to a pattern shaped to serve the needs of the State whether or not those needs coincide with those of the individual. Our system is designed to give young people the know-how to help them to excel in their best fields of endeavor as free individuals.

Although we traveled widely and saw a great many schools, obviously there was much that we did not see and our time was limited. It should be noted, too, that education in the U.S.S.R. is changing rapidly. Some of what we saw and reported may no longer be current practice. It is valuable now chiefly as a backdrop of history against which continuing changes will undoubtedly take place. Therefore, we hope that educators in the United States will continue to study education in the U.S.S.R. so that their findings can be coordinated and evaluated and be made widely available.

Some of the areas of Soviet education about which we particularly need more information include the content and procedures in university courses, especially in science; vocational schools other than technicums; the schools for the exceptional children, including the deaf, the crippled, and the mentally retarded; 4-year and 7-year rural schools; gymnastic schools; military schools; party schools; experimental English schools; adult education courses; Pioneer camps, inservice teacher education programs; parent relationship to schools; the patterns of choices of circles by individual young people; and the facts of history which are taught, particularly in the history of other countries.

Aside from the broad impression we gained, we were favorably impressed by the following specific aspects of Soviet education:

The growth and development, the management and equipment, of nurseries, and kindergarten establishments.

The clean, neat boarding schools and the industry of pupils and teachers.

The favorable teacher load, class size, and the supporting personnel such as laboratory assistants and curriculum aids.

Emphasis on productive work and respect for manual labor.

Part-time schooling and correspondence schooling.

Dignity and respect between boys and girls.

Close cooperation of industry with the schools.

The quality and adequacy of laboratory equipment and teaching aids, many of which were made by pupils and/or teachers.

The heavy emphasis and effectiveness of foreign language instruction at the pedagogical institutes and universities.

The motivation for individual learning and enrichment provided by the work of the pioneer circles, which keep boys and girls constructively engaged outside of the regular classroom hours.

The close cooperation of schools with the home.

Parent education courses and frequent parent-teacher conferences.

The emphasis on physical education and health; the provisions for medical and nursing services in the schools.

The education provided for the blind.

The close articulation between the pioneer circles and the schools and between school and industry.

The provision of time in the program for school excursions.

The program of summer camps provided for the young pioneers.

Aspects questioned

On the other hand, we question these specific aspects of Soviet education:

The adequacy of conversational practice in foreign languages below the university level, in terms of the number of years devoted to such study.

The uniformity of the curriculums in the general education or 10-year schools.

The requirement that all pupils wear uniforms.

The seeming lack of emphasis on the humanities.

The paucity of artistic training within the regular school day (except in the special schools of music, ballet, and art).

The limited nature of homemaking programs.

The in-school provision for the gifted as contrasted with the great emphasis on pushing weaker pupils through the uniform curriculum.

The use of examinations, aside from motivating students and as a learning experience in work under pressure.

The lack of instruction on other economic systems and societies.

These are highlights of our impressions from a brief contact with Soviet schools. We think that such contacts should be continued and expanded. We noted for instance, with regret, the absence of letters and exhibits from the United States among such displays in the U.S.S.R. schools and in the pioneer palaces. We hope that the cultural exchanges now underway will encourage an exchange of materials as well as people between the two countries.

We cannot afford to be apathetic about educational developments in the U.S.S.R. Clearly the Soviet Union is bent on overtaking and surpassing us as a world power, and it proposes to use education as one of the primary means of obtaining this objective.

Since the educational system of any people or country is one of the most brilliantly illuminating facets of a culture, we feel that within the scope of our observations we have gained some insight into the people of the U.S.S.R. through studying their educational system.

We want to emphasize that what we saw in the U.S.S.R. only served to renew our confidence in our better schools. But, at the same time, what we saw increased our concern for our poorer schools, suffering from neglect.

In the light of all we saw, we cannot stress too firmly our conviction that our Nation must never forget nor underestimate the power and potential of education.

APPENDIX B

SOVIET EDUCATIONAL REORGANIZATION FOR 1959–63

(By William K. Medlin)

Following several years of gradual changes in Soviet school programs toward making education more practical, and after many months of active discussion in the Soviet press and public institutions, the Soviet Legislature (Supreme Soviet) enacted on December 24, 1958, a new fundamental law on education. This law, if fully implemented, will substantially recast the educational system in the U.S.S.R. The measure is entitled "Law on Strengthening the Ties of School With Life and on the Further Development of the System of Public Education in the U.S.S.R.," and it is binding on all 15 constituent Soviet Republics. The law contains four major sections, each dealing with a major school system (primary-secondary, vocational-technical, secondary special, and higher schools), and has a total of 42 articles.

The immediate background of the reforms which have been passed by the legislature can be traced to the 19th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, held in October, 1952, when high officials in the party and Government called for more practical training of Soviet youth along polytechnical lines.

ABUNDANT LITERATURE

The abundant literature and information given out so far on the question of school reforms provide some explanation and rationale for the impending changes. For some years Soviet schools have not been producing sufficient numbers of young people with particular vocational, technical, and other labor skills. With enrollments in the 3 senior grades (8 to 10) of the 10-year school mounting to 5 to 6 million and annual graduations ranging from 1 million to 1,500,000, the 10-year schools have been training too many youngsters in the academic, preuniversity line and too few in the vocational and industrially oriented lines of education. This situation has had important economic and social effects which the government has now determined to eliminate. Among these effects has been a growing disinclination of secondary school students and graduates to engage in physical labor.

In his public statement to the Presidium of the Central Committee in September 1958, Mr. Khrushchev said: "A portion of those who finish the 10-year school unwillingly go to work in factories, plants, and collective and state farms, and some even consider that it is an insult to them." Young people ought "to know how to hold a hammer and not to confuse the handle with the claws," he remarked at the April Komsomol Congress. In addition to singling out a negative attitude toward physical labor, the Soviet leader pointed to social inequities in higher school admissions procedures. He said that in Moscow institutions of higher learning, "30-40 percent of the students are children of workers and peasants. The rest of the students are children of employees, the intelligentsia."

The new Soviet law outlines in broad fashion the essential features of the new school reforms that will be introduced, but it does not delineate very specifically or precisely the character and content of future studies. These details are left to educational administrations in the fifteen Soviet Republics and in the Soviet Federal Government.

Some further indication of the different kinds of curriculums to be offered may be found, however, in the November recommendations (theses) put forward by the Central Committee and the U.S.S.R. Council of Ministers. The new December law states that the Supreme Soviet "approves the theses * * * which have received general support in the course of national consideration [of them]." These recommendations will provide us some additional insights into the major changes in Soviet schools. A brief analysis of these changes follows.

PRIMARY-SECONDARY EDUCATION

A compulsory, universal, and generally unified 8-year school is to be the basic educational program throughout the Soviet Union. The school's curriculum will be similar to that now used in the 7-year school, but with a decidedly stronger industrial-arts-vocational orientation. It will be, in official terms, "an incomplete secondary, general educational, labor, polytechnical school, which must give to pupils the simple fundamentals of general education and polytechnical knowledge, teach love for labor and preparation for socially useful activity, and educate children along moral, physical, and esthetic lines." Boys will receive better preparation in knowledge and skills useful in industry or agriculture, while girls will receive training in domestic skills.

After graduation from the 8-year school, all youths will be expected to engage in some form of productive labor. If the young person so chooses, he or she may continue secondary education on a part-time basis.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE SOVIET EDUCATION REFORMS

After the reform measures take effect, it will be well to see the results of the new Soviet education on technical and scientific competencies of Soviet society. Should there be no serious disruption in the university level programs or in the selectivity of qualified youth for higher education and training, how would the system of rigid priorities as well as of selective procedures tend to shape social forms, especially among scientific, political, and cultural milieux?

If Soviet society in the next 3 to 5 years enters into an intensive "tooling-up" period, would the increased technical and scientific competencies that might ensue therefrom have implications for education in the United States? Certainly the course of the Soviet educational reforms, and particularly developments in certain fields—such as education by correspondence and through split-session programs—should receive deserved attention by competent observers in the years ahead. Experiences of recent years instruct us to remain alert to and informed about educational developments abroad.

LINDA KAY GIBSON—LIFESAVER EXTRAORDINARY

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the other day there appeared in the press of my home State a wonderful story, a news story of great human interest, and a story which portrays qualities of character and courage that should be an inspiration to anyone.

The U.S. Senate has been discussing some rather serious matters throughout the year. Once in a while it seems that we may become so involved in saving the world that we forget about how to save a life.

I hold in my hand a United Press International news story datelined St. Paul, Minn., September 5, 1959. It reads as follows:

GIRL, 10, REVIVES SISTER—RECALLS STORY AND BREATHES INTO MOUTH OF 2-YEAR-OLD

ST. PAUL, September 5.—A 10-year-old girl breathed life into the body of her 2-year-old sister.

Linda Kay Gibson revived her sister, Joyce, Thursday while their mother frantically tried to telephone a doctor and the police for help.

Linda Kay said that she had noticed that her sister, who was ill, began to strangle. She called her mother. After a vain effort to help the baby, Mrs. Eugene Gibson handed the baby to Linda Kay and rushed to phone for help. The baby appeared to have stopped breathing.

Linda Kay said she remembered that her mother once told her about a newspaper story that told of a life being saved by mouth-to-mouth resuscitation.

"So I thought it might work with Joyce," she said. It did.

It seems to me that every once in a while a story as dramatic, touching, and inspiring as this little human interest story ought to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S FISCAL PROGRAM FOR FISCAL YEAR 1961

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, late Saturday night our friends across the aisle, with, I regret to say, the assistance of the very sincere and conservative wing on my side of the aisle, defeated for the second time an effort to close tax loopholes in order to raise enough money to protect the general fund and yet permit the highway program to go forward without the imposition of a regressive, and to my way of thinking, unfair tax on gasoline.

It occurs to me that when we reassemble next year it might be possible to persuade the administration to reverse its field in its adamant opposition to the closing of tax loopholes.

Accordingly, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], and I have addressed a letter to Hon. Maurice H. Stans, Director, Bureau of the Budget, urging him, in the course of the preparation of the 1961 budget, to obtain the consent of the President to closing seven outrageous and inequitable tax loopholes.

I am sure that if the administration would take this action we would have the additional revenue necessary to do one or more of three things: First, to make a reduction in the national debt; second, to balance the budget; and, third, to put some money into social programs which, in my judgment, are so badly needed. I hope this plea to the administration will not fall on deaf ears.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter addressed to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget by the four Senators I have named under date of September 2, 1959, be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 2, 1959.

Hon. MAURICE H. STANS,
Director, Bureau of the Budget,
Executive Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. STANS: The preparation of the administration's fiscal program for fiscal year 1961 is undoubtedly well advanced by this time and will be completed during the period in which Congress will stand in adjournment.

Although we might differ about whether increased public revenue should be used for debt retirement, needed public services or tax reform and relief, we feel confident that we share with you a common objective in your work on the 1961 program: that the yield from our revenue-raising laws should be increased, wherever possible, by the elimination of unjust loopholes and better enforcement of those laws.

Our legislative efforts during the present session of Congress have convinced us that additional revenue could and should be raised by the following actions:

1. Requiring that income taxes on dividend and interest payments be withheld at source;

2. Tightening the rules concerning the deduction of "ordinary and necessary" business expenses, especially in the luxury expense account and business gift areas;

3. Narrowing the types of income accorded favored capital gains treatment;

4. Elimination of the 4-percent-dividend credit;

5. Reduction of the rate for oil, gas, and other mineral depletion allowance for oil, gas, and other minerals.

6. Requiring second-class users of the U.S. mails to pay for the full costs of their use of the mails;

7. Increasing the number of enforcement personnel in the Internal Revenue Service to permit more auditing and intensified search for unreported income.

In preparing the administration's program for fiscal 1961, we urge you to give special attention to these areas, where the potential for increasing public revenues is great, and to include remedial legislation among the President's recommendations to the second session of the 86th Congress.

We would appreciate your advice as to the extent you are in accord with our views on the foregoing.

Sincerely,

JOSEPH S. CLARK.
EUGENE J. MCCARTHY.
PAUL H. DOUGLAS.
WILLIAM PROXMIRE.

INCREASE IN CEILING ON INTEREST RATES ON GOVERNMENT SECURITIES

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I listened with great interest to the colloquy which took place a few moments ago as a result of the statement by the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH] of his intention to propose an amendment to the bill to remove the ceilings on the interest rates on E- and H-bonds, as well as open market long-term securities.

I have already told my friend from Connecticut that I applaud him in that regard, although I shall do my best to see that his amendment is defeated. I disagree with him.

Mr. President, I am in no hurry to get home. I do not believe that we should force an adjournment of Congress next Saturday. We have many important matters to deal with, and raising the ceiling on the interest rate on Government securities is an important matter, deserving of free and full debate, without limitation by unanimous consent. I think we should be accorded the privilege of debating the subject. The President has asked for it. I believe that the subject deserves careful consideration, and I, for one, would like the privilege of voting the President down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to continue for 1 more minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. I think we should deal calmly and quietly with legislation to be passed at this session, including civil rights legislation, minimum wage legislation, and Federal aid to education legislation; also a decision on the interest rate on Government securities. I, for one, am prepared to remain here, under the ordinary rules of debate in the Senate, until those matters are disposed of. The arrival of Mr. Khrushchev does not scare me a bit.

EXTENSION OF AGRICULTURAL TRADE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1954

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, in the debate on Friday, September 4, 1959, I placed in the RECORD the latest report from the Department of Agriculture, dated September 3, 1959, covering the distribution of surplus food for needy persons and for other objectives such as are now approved, including the school lunch program, the institutional program, and some distribution to foreign beneficiaries. Everything which I said in my remarks at that time, which begin on page 18105 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, is true and applicable to the debate on the pending business, which is the proposed extension of Public Law 480, except that in one matter I used a figure which applies to the combined cost of the domestic and foreign programs, instead of applying only to the domestic program, which is what I was discussing at that time. This is clearly shown by the table itself, which appears in the RECORD.

But I call attention now to the fact that instead of stating that $457.9 million was the total cost of the program for 1958—although that is correct—I should have said that the cost of the domestic program in 1958 was $185.4 million, while the balance of the figure of $457.9 million covered foreign distribution; and instead of stating that $413.4 million was the total cost of the program for 1959, I should have stated the figure as $203.6 million as the cost of the domestic program for 1959.

The larger figures deal with the total cost of the foreign and domestic programs for the 2 years, 1958 and 1959.

I believe the table is quite clear, but in order to mislead no one I call attention to the discrepancy between my statement and the actual facts as shown by the compilation which was placed in the RECORD.

I also call attention to the fact that my statement to the effect that 43 States are now cooperating in the program for the distribution of surplus foods as processed under the extension and enlargement of a program originally authorized in legislation which I handled in committee and on the Senate floor in 1955, was correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for an additional minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLAND. Senators will find on page 18105 the number of persons unemployed or otherwise needy or entitled to food from our surplus supplies who were receiving donated commodities from the Department of Agriculture, under the existing laws, in June of 1959.

As would be expected, these numbers totaling 4,715,349 are greatest in those States where there are great unemployment problems, which is what Congress intended.

I call attention to this matter at this time because additional amendments may be offered later during the day relative to the distribution of surplus commodities, and I want to be on record as being strictly in accord with the facts under the law and the latest report of the Department of Agriculture.

FHA HOUSING LOAN COMMITMENT FEES

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have received from a citizen in Tennessee, who wishes to build a home, a copy of an FHA commitment. This citizen wishes to build for himself and his family a modest home to cost $14,000. I have the commitment before me, and I should like to read from it:

> Fees and charges will be made as outlined to you at the time the application was taken, which we estimate to be $417.98.

The figure "$417.98" is written into a space provided on the application form for that purpose. There is also typewritten into the commitment letter this additional statement:

> This commitment is issued subject to someone other than the buyer paying to us a discount equivalent to 6 percent of the loan, which in this case amounts to $885.

Mr. President, these two fees added together amount to more than $1,300 on one workingman's home, which he must pay in order to enable him to obtain insurance of his mortgage by the Government of the United States.

This cost, I emphasize, is not all, because after the application is approved there is added to it another one-half percent premium, called an insurance premium.

Here is another line I wish to read:

> We estimate monthly payments to be $110.21.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, this is a 25-year loan commitment, so the payment will be made over a period of 300 months. A calculation indicates that this worker, who wishes to build a home for himself and his family, will pay $34,365.98 for a home on which he received a loan of $14,750. This a partial illustration of how homeowners, or persons who wish to build or buy homes, are being bilked under the high interest rate policy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter of commitment, from which I have stricken the street address, the name of the borrower, and the name of the mortgage lender, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the commitment letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NASHVILLE, TENN., September 3, 1959.

No.: FHA ———— VA ————.

Property: Nashville, Tenn.

Amount: $14,750. Rate 5¼. Term 25 years.

Type: ☒FHA ☐GI ☐Conventional.

This commitment will expire October 31, 1959.

DEAR SIR: Reference is made to your loan application filed with us in connection with the property described above. We are pleased to advise that the loan has been approved as set out above. Based on such approval, we agree to make the loan subject to:

☒ the terms and conditions appearing on the FHA commitment;

☐ the terms and conditions appearing on the VA commitment or certificate of reasonable value;

☐ satisfactory completion of the improvements;

☒ receipt of satisfactory evidence of title;

☒ receipt of satisfactory survey of the property showing the location of the improvements thereon;

☒ insurance policy in an amount satisfactory to us;

☐ receipt of VA or FHA commitment in the above mentioned amount, term, and interest rate.

Remarks: This commitment is issued subject to someone other than the buyer paying to us a discount equivalent to 6 percent of the loan, which in this case amounts to $885.

We estimate monthly payments to be $110.21.

Fees and charges will be made as outlined to you at the time the application was taken, which we estimate to be $417.98.

Very truly yours,

———— ————.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I compliment the Senator from Tennessee on showing graphic evidence of what is happening to the Government-insured interest rate. As the Senator read the figures, I did rapid calculation. My calculation shows that the buyer is buying $14,000 worth of house and $20,000 worth of interest. Is that not correct?

Mr. GORE. That is approximately correct.

Mr. MONRONEY. And the administration has set, as a pattern, in estimating the cost of public works and others, the ultimate cost over period of years; so the $14,000 cost of the house and $20,000-interest charge come out of the $34,000 figure, do they not?

Mr. GORE. Yes; the $34,000—plus.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). The time available to the Senator from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the Senator from Tennessee may proceed for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MONRONEY. Does not the Senator from Tennessee feel that this is graphic proof, because it happens to figure out at exactly 5¾ percent interest, plus one-half of 1 percent extra charges for Government insurance, which bring the working rate that he pays to 6¼ percent?

Mr. GORE. I believe it is 6½ percent.

Mr. MONRONEY. Is this not graphic proof that today a mortgage insured by the U.S. Government is bringing a higher interest return than are the conventional mortgages which are being written by insurance companies or other home-finance agencies?

Mr. GORE. I agree thoroughly. This discount racket stultifies the mortgage-insurance program of the U.S. Government.

Mr. MONRONEY. And we are seeing a higher yield from Government-insured mortgages than from mortgages that do not carry the guarantee of the U.S. Government, are we not?

Mr. GORE. Yes; and that raises the question of the integrity of the whole program.

Mr. MONRONEY. Will the Senator from Tennessee yield further to me?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. MONRONEY. Is it not also a fact that it is an open secret, known everywhere in the housing industry, that as soon as Congress adjourns, the FHA Administrator will raise the present going interest rate on FHA mortgages from 5¼ percent to 5¾ percent?

Mr. GORE. Yes; and I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will join me, if there is to be a third housing bill, in writing a provision to prevent that from happening.

Mr. MONRONEY. At least until Congress can return and can take action to prevent it from happening; is that correct?

Mr. GORE. Yes, that is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time made available to the Senator from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I seek recognition in my own right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. MONRONEY. Let me ask the Senator from Tennessee whether it is not also a fact that in view of the historic difference between the Government's long-term interest rate, which is pegged at 4¼ percent, and the FHA interest rate, which is the Siamese twin of the interest rate on long-term Government bonds—because the former also has Government security and a Government guarantee behind it—the present development has the definite effect of linking together these two interest rates?

Mr. GORE. Yes; indeed.

Mr. MONRONEY. So if we raise the latter by administrative action—as has been done countless times by this administration, in the case of the Farmers Home Administration and in regard to everything else that can be raised—we are placing ourselves on an escalator which is lifting higher and higher the long-term Government interest rate and also the rate which Uncle Sam must pay to service the public debt, which today is approaching $300 billion?

Mr. GORE. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. So the Government—and also, in some cases, the Congress—today is creating the chaotic condition with which we now find ourselves confronted, with the chiefs of the governmental agencies which deal in this field pleading for an unlimited interest rate ceiling on long-term Government bonds?

Mr. GORE. Yes, indeed; and the Senator from Oklahoma has joined with me in two attempts to outlaw the discount practice; and I believe we were correct in the position we took.

Mr. MONRONEY. And time has proven again and again that a higher interest rate on Government-insured securities begets a demand for higher and higher interest rates on the entire public debt which must be managed by the administration.

PROPOSED COMMISSION ON EQUAL JOB OPPORTUNITIES UNDER GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, one of the civil rights bills which has received too little attention during this session is the proposal to establish a Commission on Equal Job Opportunity Under Government Contracts.

I believe that it is in the national interest to pass this bill. Our Government has made, under this administration and preceding administrations, significant progress toward securing equal job opportunity for all qualified persons. We must continue this progress. I believe that the proposed Commission will be an effective instrument for doing just this.

We know that the equal job opportunity program has been carried on by the President's Committee on Government Contracts. This Committee, which was established in August 1953, by Executive order of President Eisenhower, has been quietly, but effectively, carrying on its assignment.

The Vice President, who is Chairman of the Committee, and the Secretary of Labor, who is the Vice Chairman, have authorized me to state that they will resign upon the enactment of this bill. They will recommend to the President that the Chairman and the Vice Chairman should be public, rather than governmental, representatives. These recommendations should eliminate the fear of anyone who thinks that this legislation is being proposed as a vehicle for the advancement of either the Vice President or the Secretary of Labor.

The policy of our Government to promote equal job opportunity for all qualified persons is a concept that demands the allegiance of all. Public morality demands that since all persons contribute to the Public Treasury, without regard to race, religion, color, or national origin, all persons are equally entitled to fair and equitable treatment on work paid for from public funds. Certainly within the area of employment carried on by the Federal Government, there can be no question that it must be administered without the blight of racial or religious bigotry.

Let me briefly touch upon the highlights of the bill:

Under its terms the President is to appoint a Commission of 15 members to carry out the national policy of equal job opportunity. The Commission would execute this program by making recommendations to the President and the Federal contracting agencies for improving and implementing the standard nondiscrimination provision which is contained in all Government procurement contracts; the Commission would encourage the furtherance of educational programs by nongovernmental groups; the Commission would cooperate with State and local governments, as well as other groups, to eliminate discrimination in employment; and it would be empowered to make investigations, studies, and surveys, as well as to conduct hearings which would be necessary and appropriate in order for it to discharge its assigned duties.

This Commission is a continuation of this administration's efforts to eliminate discrimination in employment. The present Committee on Government Contracts, composed of top officials of the Government, of labor and management, and of the public, has acted in three areas: compliance, education, and liaison.

In its compliance efforts, acting as a recommendatory, consultative, and advisory group to the Federal contracting agencies, it has made considerable progress in seeing that the Federal contracting agencies adopt appropriate procedures to aid the contracting agencies in securing fair employment in the many plants doing business for the Federal Government in every part of the country. It has also assisted the agencies in adopting effective procedures to enable them to resolve complaints filed by aggrieved persons. It has instituted a compliance survey program, whereby the employment practices of the major contractors of the Federal Government are reviewed each year, without waiting for complaints to be filed with the President's Committee.

The Committee has carried on an extensive educational program with the top leaders of business and industry, labor unions, trade associations, educators, clergy, and other interested and important segments of the general public who are concerned that our country should not countenance or condone intolerance, bigotry, or discrimination.

The President's Committee also maintains effective liaison with the many private and public agencies charged with the responsibility and the duty of eliminating discrimination in employment.

Effective as the work of the President's Committee has been, the time has now come to advance this program in a meaningful way. The enactment of this bill creating a Commission on Equal Job Opportunity Under Government Contracts, in addition to sustaining our concept of public morality, which I have already mentioned, also will aid in the efficient utilization of all our manpower. We shall not waste any skills which may exist, because of the irrelevant factors of racial and religious bigotry. We shall also continue, and maintain, the unique standing this country has had as a beacon for democratic ideals. We shall be judged by our accomplishments, not our excuses. I also believe that if the work of the President's Committee has been meaningful and successful, we then have a right to demand that the concept of equal job opportunity be expressed by the national legislature, rather than by order of the Chief Executive. In our form of government, national policies are, and should be, expressed by the legislature. If this policy is worth adhering to, it should be appropriately stated by the Congress, as an expression of public policy. If this work is worth doing, it is worth doing well.

I urge the enactment of this bill, because it is in keeping with the best traditions of our country. Our country has grown strong by waging a constant struggle against religious or racial bigotry. We will grow stronger by the passage of this bill, because of its adherence to the concepts of fair play and the elevation of human dignity.

YOUNG MAN WITH A PURPOSE

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the New York Times on Saturday published a heartwarming story about a young man, aged 13, named Chris Nogeire, who, with his $1 weekly allowance, on Friday visited the offices of New York City's newspapers in an attempt to explain the recently much-publicized problems of youth in New York City. Chris sounds like a fine young man. He belongs to a group called the Sea Battalion—organized, not for violence and crime, but for recreational activities of a nature that will allow boys to grow in an atmosphere conducive to good health and good citizenship.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article from the New York Times be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOY, 13, STARTS HIS OWN DRIVE TO EXPLAIN PROBLEMS OF YOUTH—HE SPENDS ALLOWANCE TO TELL HOW HIS BRONX GROUP FOSTERS LEADERSHIP

(By Richard J. H. Johnston)

A small, energetic 13-year-old boy yesterday began his own personal drive against juvenile delinquency and for adult recognition that "all kids aren't bad."

"Everybody, I guess, wants to be recognized, but not everybody knows how to go about it," said Chris Nogeire of 3320 Kossuth Avenue, the Bronx.

Chris spent yesterday—and a large part of his $1 weekly allowance—visiting newspaper offices to ask that the perturbed adult community understand the attitudes of youngsters who are equally perturbed over recent outbursts of juvenile violence.

The world in which Chris lives is not so very different from that of other boys who have run afoul of the law.

His father died 10 years ago. Chris lives with his mother, who works as a secretary for a law firm. He is an eighth-grade pupil at St. Anne's Roman Catholic School at Bainbridge Avenue and Gun Hill Road. He lives in a neighborhood of Italians and Spanish-speaking families. He was born in Washington, D.C., and was brought to New York when he was 3 months old.

EXPLAINS HIS GROUP

"There is plenty of chance for a boy to be recognized as a leader, for instance, in a group like the one I belong to. It's the Sea Battalion at 3207 Philips Avenue. I have written an article about it that you may have," Chris declared.

He proffered a neatly typed explanation of his group, its purposes, costs, and activities.

"We have sports and recreation under supervision and discipline. It costs only $1 to join and 20 cents a week for dues. Our uniform costs $10, and we meet every week. We have kids from 8 years old on up to the twenties and we have lots of competition that can make you a leader, if you want to be one," Chris explained.

"Sure, there are some kids that think we're 'square,' but we also have some who changed their minds after they came to look us over," he added.

"I think that organizations like ours may be what the city needs in places like Hell's Kitchen," he said.

There is a "big difference," Chris thought, between wanting to be "a big shot" and wanting to be "a leader."

"There is a difference, I guess, between being a 'big shot' and a 'leader' but it's not always easy for kids to figure it out," Chris remarked.

Chris hopes to become a seaman first class when the First Battalion of the Sea Battalions in the Bronx resumes its meeting with the reopening of school. In the year he has belonged to the group he has been working for the promotion.

Howard S. Irving of 3165 Fairmont Avenue, the Bronx, a railroad fireman who commands the First Battalion, said, "Chris is typical of the boys and girls in our and similar groups. Our group has never had an instance of juvenile delinquency."

FOUR HUNDRED IN FIVE BATTALIONS

The Sea Battalions, Inc., was founded 5 years ago in the Bronx to provide sports and recreation under modified military discipline for children who might otherwise be forced to spend their leisure time in the streets.

There are 400 youngsters enrolled in five battalions. The First Battalion is affiliated with St. Theresa's Roman Catholic Church, 1912 Mayflower Avenue, the Bronx.

The cadets and their girl counterparts, the Wavettes, hold an annual military ball. Frequent visits are made to scenic areas and to military installations. The cadets have been guests at the U.S. Naval and Military Academies. They also have visited the Naval Training Station at New London, Conn.

Membership is open to all children to have the desire to "belong" and the ability or aspiration to work with others for fun and preparation for life, Mr. Irving explained.

Mr. Irving said that the organization had been trying for several years to acquire a surplus naval craft for training the cadets. The group's treasury, he explained, is too small to buy one.

After high school Chris hopes to enter the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and become a nuclear physicist.

Asked if he aspired to become a leader in the world of science, he replied:

"Well, like I've been saying, you have to learn an awful lot to be a leader. You can't do it by fighting and hurting people."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, last week I addressed the Senate on the need to deal firmly with the problem of juvenile crime. I would not be fair, if, at the same time, I did not commend boys such as Chris Nogeire and leaders such as those of the Sea Battalion, who have done so much to foster healthy attitudes of brotherhood and good citizenship among New York City's youth.

Mr. President, I commend Chris Nogeire for his timely reminder to all of us that it is, fortunately, still the exception, not the rule, that a young man shall seek his pleasures in murder, violence, or vandalism.

THE PRESIDENT'S EUROPEAN TRIP: A GREAT TRIUMPH

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, as we know, President Eisenhower is scheduled to return from his European trip this afternoon.

The Eisenhower trip—a strategic and diplomatic master stroke—represents one of the major efforts and accomplishments by a leader of the free world to bind up Western unity more securely in the post-World War II era.

Of great significance—and most heart warming—were the demonstrations by the people of West Germany, Great Britain, and France of their affection, admiration, and respect for our President.

Although the trip resulted in no new formal agreements—which, of course, was not its purpose—there were, nevertheless, many real accomplishments, including:

First. Erasure of some of the fears that have arisen in the European mind that the United States might make a separate deal with the Soviet Union, during the Khrushchev visit, without adequate regard for the interests of our allies.

Second. Reaffirmation of the confidence of the people of Western Europe, not only in the capability of President Eisenhower, but in the United States as a dynamic, forward-moving leader of the free world.

Third. Promotion of understanding, and creation of a better climate for resolving whatever differences exist among the leaders of the Allies.

Fourth. By his restated willingness to do whatever is humanly possible—to go anywhere any time—to promote peace and prevent war—the President helped to put the lesser problems among the allies in better perspective.

Fifth. The "spelling out" for Khrushchev of the unity of the Allies and the confidence which not only the United States, but also the people of Europe, have in Ike's leadership.

Although these and other accomplishments may be less tangible than formal, signed agreements, perhaps in the long run, they will be of even greater significance.

Overall, the trip, I believe, greatly helps to strengthen the Allied position by inspiring new confidence among the Western nations and, by contrast, greater respect among the Communists—to enable us to deal more effectively with their threats to peace now and in the future.

Upon his return, the President again—as for similar accomplishments throughout his tenure of office—deserves the deep gratitude of the American people for one more job well done.

TWO MOBRIDGES IN TWO STATES

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, Mobridge, S. Dak., has long prided itself in being "the only Mobridge in the world." Quite recently, Mobridge learned that it is no longer alone since the founding of Mobridge, Mont., on the banks of the Missouri River in Fergus County. In a neighborly gesture this week, Mobridge, S. Dak., extended a hand of congratulations to the new community in a letter from Bob Bickett, president of the chamber of commerce to George Komerik, the first mayor of Mobridge, Mont.

Bob Bickett indicates his puzzlement that other communities along the "Big Muddy" had not adopted the name, as Mobridge did 53 years ago, when the main line of the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific Railroad was extended through the northern part of my home State. Because there was no town at the site of the river crossing, all construction materials were addressed to "Missouri River Bridge, South Dakota," later shortened to "Missouri Bridge," and still later "Mobridge." With the coming of the railroad, Mobridge, S. Dak., grew up on the banks of the "Mighty Mo," becoming one of our most prosperous and vigorous communities in the State and the Northwest.

In the correspondence between the two Mobridges, helpful hints are offered on how to become a "Mobridge, first class" and to outline the standards for cities named "Mobridge."

Mr. President, I suggest that the letter I hold in my hand presents some standards for all progressive communities. South Dakota has given birth to the original Mobridge, and has set high standards for the Mobridge club. I know that Mobridge, Mont., will live up to that criterion, and will become another jewel in the Treasure State.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Mobridge Chamber of Commerce letter be printed in the RECORD, since it contains useful advice for all our smaller communities.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOBRIDGE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Mobridge, S. Dak., September 1, 1959.

Mr. GEORGE KOMERIK,
Roy, Mont.

DEAR SIR: We, at Mobridge, S. Dak., were unaware until very recently that a new town was being built in Montana, near the new Missouri River bridge in Fergus County, which would be named "Mobridge, Mont." As you may have heard, our community of Mobridge, S. Dak., has long prided itself as being the only Mobridge in the world. Actually, we have long been puzzled because we could not understand why other cities have not adopted such an excellent name. Now, you have joined the club, and we have two Mobridges in 2 States, 2 down and 48 to go.

Our reason for writing you this letter, in addition to congratulating you on your new city, is that we wish to call your attention to the standards for cities named "Mobridge" as has been established by our community in the past 53 years. For example: To qualify as a "Mobridge, first class," you must assemble a citizenry of 5,500 friendly people, who have stuck to their town, through thick and thin, dust, drouth, grasshoppers, and Republican and Democratic administrations alike. (The number of citizens can be varied, the quality must be up to the standard as outlined.) To qualify as a Mobridge, first class, you must have wide, blacktopped streets, a first class water supply, and adequate transportation via railroad, and highway. You must have a ball park, swimming pool, and other recreational facilities so that your young people have adequate opportunities for good clean fun. You must have civic minded organizations, ready to assist with the work of building your city ever larger and better. (Of course, an active chamber of commerce is a must, without it you will spend a good deal of time charging windmills, instead of progressing, and taking advantage of your opportunities.) And last, but not least, you must have an Indian chief, of the stature of Sitting Bull, buried near your town, properly marked and cared for, as a tribute from your people to America's original citizens.

That's all there is to it. Whenever your town is formally opened, we would appreciate an invitation to attend any ceremonies you may plan. And if you need any advice on how to be a Mobridge, first class, drop us a line, we've got 53 years of experience going for us, we may be able to help.

Every good wish.

BOB BICKETT,
President, Mobridge Chamber of Commerce.

ARMY LANGUAGE SCHOOL

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should like to call to the attention of the Senate a letter which I today addressed to Secretary of Defense McElroy relating to a serious situation existing at the Army Language School at Monterey, Calif.

As Members may recall, the Air Force earlier this year announced its intention of withdrawing its support from the Army Language School, the Nation's largest foreign language training center, effective July 1, last, to send its students to private institutions for specialized training the Air Force claimed it could not obtain at Monterey.

While I was not in full accord with this decision, I did not demand that it be rescinded because of financial commitments the Government had already made with certain universities to train the Air Force's students and because of assurances given by the Department of Defense that the highest priority would be given to maintaining the Army Language School at its maximum strength despite the Air Force's withdrawal from the facility.

However, Mr. President, I am now in receipt of a communication from Mr. George Shkabara, president of Local No. 1263 of the National Federation of Federal Employees, at Monterey, who quotes a representative of the Department of the Army to the effect that the Air Force's withdrawal may result in a major reduction in force among the instructors at the facility—instructors, I might add, who have been recruited at great expense from all parts of the world to teach foreign languages to members of the military services. This, if true, Mr. President, certainly contradicts the Defense Department's avowed intention of maintaining the Army Language School at its maximum strength to meet the urgent foreign language training needs of the military services.

I, therefore, have addressed a letter to the Secretary of Defense, asking that he give his immediate attention to this matter before any major reduction in force among the instructors at this vitally needed facility is made. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that my letter to the Secretary of Defense, along with Mr. Shkabara's letter to me, be incorporated in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 3, 1959.

Hon. NEIL H. MCELROY,
Secretary of Defense,
The Pentagon, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MCELROY: As you are aware, members of the subcommittee were assured at the executive hearing conducted on the Federal Government's foreign language training program earlier this year that the highest priority would be given to restoring the Army Language School at Monterey, Calif., to its maximum strength following the Air Force's withdrawal July 1.

I have been informed, however, that the National Federation of Federal Employees has been notified by the Department of the Army that there is a possibility of a major reduction in force among the institution's instructors because of the Air Force's withdrawal, as indicated in the attached letter from Mr. George Shkabara, president of Local No. 1236, of the federation, dated August 21, 1959.

In view of the fact that this information appears to contradict the views expressed by the representatives of the Department of Defense at the aforementioned hearing, I would indeed appreciate it very much if you would give me a full report in writing on the situation existing at the Monterey facility, covering, but not limited to, the following salient points:

(1) Steps that have been taken by the Department of Defense to centralize direction of the Military Establishment's foreign language training programs.

(2) The progress that has been made in the establishment and/or the appointment of an official within the Department of Defense at high policy level to have the responsibility for operation of the military services foreign language training programs.

(3) The specific steps that have been taken by the Department of Defense and/or by the Department of the Army to build up the strength of the Army Language Training School to offset the impact of the Air Force's withdrawal of its students.

(4) The total number of students assigned to the Army Language Training School as of January 1, 1959, as of July 1, 1959, and the anticipated number which will be assigned as of January 1, 1960. The total number of Air Force students withdrawn from the facility as of July 1, 1959.

(5) The total number of instructors assigned to the Army Language School as of January 1, 1959, July 1, 1959, and the total number anticipated to be assigned as of January 1, 1960.

(6) Total Federal expenditures for operation of the Army Language Training School for fiscal year 1959, including training costs, administrative costs, trainees' salaries, and other related operating costs.

(7) The estimated budget or estimated operating costs, including the expenditures enumerated above, for comparative purposes, for fiscal year 1960.

(8) The anticipated reduction in instructors, if any, which will result from the Air Force's withdrawal from the facility.

I would indeed appreciate your immediate attention to this request. That there is danger of a major reduction in force at the Army Language School is indeed disturbing as it has been my distinct impression that every effort would be made to keep this vital facility at its maximum efficiency to meet the urgent need for trained linguists in the military services.

With kindest regards.

Sincerely yours,

HUBERT H. HUMPHREY.

(Attachment: Letter from Mr. George Shkabara, president, Local No. 1236, National Federation of Federal Employees.)

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES, LOCAL NO. 1263,
Monterey, Calif., August 21, 1959.

Hon. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Government Reorganization, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We felt you might be interested to share the information we have from the Under Secretary of the Army regarding the operation of one of the most important departments at the U.S. Army Language School—the Russian Language Department.

According to Under Secretary Hugh M. Milton, II, "there is a possibility of a major reduction in force in the Russian Language Department in the present fiscal year." The Under Secretary adds in his letter dated August 17, 1959, to Mr. Vaux Owen, president of our Federation, that "The withdrawal by the Department of the Air Force of its supported training at the U.S. Army language School has made such action necessary."

Headquarters, U.S. Army Language School estimates probable loss in personnel at the Russian Language Department would not exceed 40 instructors. So far no official authorization to effectuate a reduction in force has been received from the Department of the Army, but the authorities of the school believe that a reduction in personnel, if any should take effect before the end of the current calendar year.

Strange as it may seem, the reality is in full contradiction with the recently expressed desires of the Department of Defense to bring the school up to its maximum strength during the present fiscal year; we feel that fact should not escape your vigilance.

Respectfully,

GEORGE SHKABARA, President.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am asking the Secretary of Defense to give his particular attention to this matter before there is any major reduction in force at this vitally needed facility.

Finally, let me say the Department of Defense is guilty of a waste of public funds by this duplication of the foreign language training program. I recognize that this item does not run into the hundreds of millions or billions of dollars, but, again, it is symbolic. It represents again the determination on the part of the respective individual services to have their own programs, separate and distinct from the other services, at great cost to the taxpayers, and, may I say, at no real reward to the students or the services themselves.

The Army Language Training School at Monterey ought to be utilized to the maximum extent possible. The services and the facilities are there. At the present time the school is being utilized at less than 50 percent. The Department of Defense should be censured for this waste of public funds. I am not at all satisfied with the explanation given by the Air Force for its new training program exclusive of that at Monterey. The Navy is equally guilty. It is about time that the Department of Defense stopped talking about unification of the services, and started practicing it. One place it can do it is in the foreign language school, and save some money in doing it.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Oregon, who of necessity had to leave the Chamber, I must object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The Chief Clerk resumed and completed the call of the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

EXTENSION OF AGRICULTURAL TRADE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1954

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is S. 1748.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1748) to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to paragraph (q) on page 3, beginning at line 9 of amendments identified as "8–25–59–B," on which a separate vote is asked.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I have no further statement to make on this paragraph except to say that it has administration recommendation. It is surely desirable.

I yield back the remainder of my time on this paragraph if the proponents are willing to do likewise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time in opposition has expired.

The Senator from Minnesota yields back the remainder of his time. All time for debate has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the parliamentary situation is that we are voting now to include paragraph (q). Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD at this point an explanation of this amendment.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EMERGENCY NONFOOD RELIEF

Page 3, lines 9 through 13 of committee amendments (par. (12) "(r)" of S. 1711):

This amendment provides for the use of title I foreign currencies for nonfood emergency or extraordinary relief requirements. It would be limited to $2 million in each fiscal year and therefore appropriation act authorization would not be required. It is contemplated that this authority would be used to provide blankets, tents, medicines, and similar supplies required as immediate assistance as a result of disasters such as fire, flood, or earthquake. The Deputy Director of the International Cooperation Administration testified that the President now has authority to use dollars for this purpose, and that distribution would be made through relief agencies such as Red Cross.

OTHER PROPOSED CHANGES IN LEGISLATION

"I should also like to comment briefly on two other proposed changes in the Public Law 480 legislation.

"1. New subsection authorizing use of foreign currency accruing under title I of Public Law 480 for emergency relief assistance: And you, Mr. Congressman, were talking about this a little earlier, sir.

"This subsection, if adopted, will permit the President to meet emergency requirements of friendly peoples abroad other than those which are normally met under title II of Public Law 480 through grants of agricultural commodities or through use of currencies generated by grants of such commodities. The proposed authority would be useful, for example, in enabling the United States to provide blankets, tents, medicines, and similar supplies which are required immediately as a result of disasters such as fire, flood, or earthquake.

"I want to reiterate this is a proposed use of a local currency already generated, and not a new use of dollars.

"It is not expected that large amounts of foreign currencies will be needed for this purpose, and a ceiling figure is proposed of not more than the equivalent of $2 million to be used in any fiscal year for emergency relief purposes. It is believed that this statutory annual ceiling on use of currency for emergency purposes of this kind will provide the Congress with adequate fiscal control over the use of the proposed new authority. In view of the unforeseen emergency nature of the requirements which the authority is designed to meet and the necessity of immediate response to such requirements when they arise, it will not be practicable to seek authorization to use currency for this purpose in appropriation acts.

"We have lots of instances, gentlemen, where there has been an earthquake, or there has been a flood, or there has been a disaster of some kind or other. People may have no place to live, and the authority from the Congress to use this local currency to pick up local supplies, including tents, medicine, clothing, and that sort of thing, would enable us to rush them in there quickly. We wouldn't have to fly such supplies from the United States and pay dollars for them. We think this authority would be a useful addition. It is not a vital one, but we think it would be useful.

"Mr. POAGE. That is a point I wanted to ask, Dr. FitzGerald. There is authority under the law at the present time, as I understand it, for the President to provide exactly this kind of emergency equipment, but he has to pay for it in dollars, does he not?

"Mr. FITZGERALD. That is correct.

"Mr. POAGE. And this is simply allowing, instead of dollars, the use of local currency where he could?

"Mr. FITZGERALD. That is correct.

"Mr. HOEVEN. I was going to ask the same question.

"What about the overlapping of such program with the work of the Red Cross? They take care of emergencies throughout the world and are very prompt in furnishing all of the materials and services you mention. Is there going to be some conflict of effort?

"Mr. FITZGERALD. No, sir. We work very closely with the Red Cross and in fact frequently use the Red Cross for the purpose of handling this.

"Mr. POAGE. You would find the material and turn it over to the Red Cross for distribution, wouldn't you?

"Mr. FITZGERALD. We might, or we might provide it to the local Red Cross.

"Mr. HOEVEN. But you wouldn't do it independently of the Red Cross, would you?

"Mr. FITZGERALD. This would be independent in the sense that we wouldn't go through the American Red Cross, but I can assure you we always clear with the Red Cross before we do anything.

"Mr. HOEVEN. I think that is important. We don't want any duplication of effort which might result in a lot of waste and misunderstanding.

"Mr. POAGE. Let's get this clear. I think you intended to make it clear, but I think you confused, at least you did me when I asked you if you wouldn't go ahead if you had this authority and buy this equipment and turn it over to the Red Cross for distribution rather than distribute it yourself.

"If I understood you correctly, you said that you might not turn it over to the Red Cross, but you might turn it over to the local Red Cross. That is, of course, what I meant.

"I did not mean that you would necessarily run it through the American Red Cross, but you would turn it over to the relief agency to make the distribution, and you wouldn't set up a relief agency to go out and distribute it.

"Mr. FITZGERALD. You are absolutely right. If I left any thought in the minds of the committee that we would establish a relief agency to make the distribution, I apologize. We would turn it over to the appropriate authority and we would reach agreement with the American Red Cross to do so.

"Mr. HOEVEN. And whatever you would do would be at the request of and in cooperation with the local Red Cross?

"Mr. FITZGERALD. At the request of the agency of that government.

"Mr. POAGE. It might be the Red Crescent in Turkey.

"Mr. FITZGERALD. That is correct.

"Mr. HOEVEN. Well, whatever agency it is."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is the situation now that the balance of the amendment, starting on line 17, page 2, through line 6, on page 4, is the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the other parts of the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, unless there is opposition, I would suggest that the Senate vote.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, earlier this morning the distinguished Senator from Minnesota and I conferred for quite some time with respect to his pending amendments. One of the aims sought by these amendments is to provide that the Appropriations Committee must approve the spending of any Public Law 480 funds before they can actually be expended for the various uses outlined in other amendments. In effect, only one new use would be added to the Public Law 480 program under the Senator's amendments. I refer to the one listed in paragraph (r) on page 3 of the printed committee amendments. It would establish a limitation of $5 million on the use of foreign currencies to finance the preparation, distribution, and exhibiting of audiovisual informational and educational materials.

Under the law as it now stands, dollars could be used for that purpose. This amendment includes a provision to make it possible to use a maximum of $5 million in these Public Law 480 funds for that purpose.

There remains a slight disagreement between the distinguished Senator from Minnesota and myself with regard to certain uses to which these funds can be put, and as to what the law now provides. I suggested to the Senator from Minnesota that, as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I was willing to accept these amendments on the condition that, in the meantime, we look into the legality of some of the provisions, to be certain that there is no duplication. Then if we discover that there is any illegality, we can make any necessary corrections in conference.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That was the understanding.

Mr. ELLENDER. With that understanding, I have no objection to the proposals included in the amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. One further understanding is that these items should clear through the Appropriations Committee from year to year.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes. I so stated.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That was the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. ELLENDER. There is the further understanding that the amendment to title IV will not be agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 3, lines 9 to 13, of the printed committee amendments.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks an explanation of each of the separate titles now under discussion.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SCIENTIFIC, CULTURAL, EDUCATION, AND HEALTH PROGRAMS

Page 2, lines 17 through 22, of committee amendments (par. (10) of S. 1711):

This provision authorizes the use of title I foreign currencies to promote and support programs of medical and scientific research, cultural and educational development, health, nutrition, and sanitation. The committee report indicates that this authority already exists and that this provision is intended to emphasize those uses. The language is very broad and will most likely be construed to grant some new authority, as it purports to do. At least one witness appearing before the Foreign Relations Committee cited it as an example of the manner in which S. 1711 would have broadened the atuhorized uses of local currencies (page 124 of hearings). The Department of Agriculture in its letter of August 28, reporting on the amendments to S. 1748, reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, also indicates that it considers this provision to represent an "expansion of the section 104(k) currency use." It therefore appears clear that this language, which the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations described as emphasis rather than expansion, is likely to be construed to mean something different than the Committee on Foreign Relations intended.

WORKSHOPS IN AMERICAN STUDIES

Page 2, line 23 through page 3, line 8 (pars. (11) and (12) of S. 1711):

This provision strikes a currently authorized use out of section 104(o) and reenacts it as section 104(p). As S. 1711 was introduced, this provision would have removed this use from the necessity of appropriation act authorization. This is not the case as this provision was contained in the Committee amendments on S. 1711 as that bill was reported. The provision now serves no apparent purpose.

AUDIOVISUAL MATERIALS

Page 3, lines 14 through 19 of committee amendments (par. (12) "(t)" of S. 1711):

This provision provides for the use of title I foreign currencies for financing the preparation, distribution, and exhibiting of audio-visual informational and educational materials, including Government materials, abroad: Provided, That not more than a total amount equivalent to $5 million may be made available for this purpose during any fiscal year. The Department opposed this use in its letter of August 28, reporting on the committee amendments to S. 1748.

Present legislation now authorizes the use of Public Law 480 local currency sales proceeds to promote economic development. Funds may be made available on a loan basis under section (g) or, if the applicability of section 1415 is waived, on a grant basis under section 104(e). In addition, section 104(d) authorizes the use of local currency sales proceeds to finance the purchase of goods or services for other friendly countries. Here again, if section 1415 is waived, section 104(d) funds may be made available to friendly countries as a grant.

To the extent that the new uses of currency proposed under this provision would permit financing activities which are included in the concept of economic development, the addition of the new sections would not expand the authority already available. For example, in administering either grant or loan funds available under sections 104 (a), (e), or (g), ICA could approve educational projects which involved the use of audio-visual aids, such as films, exhibits and similar teaching materials.

THIRD COUNTRY TECHNICIANS

Page 3, lines 20 through 23 of committee amendments (par. (12) "(u)" of S. 1711):

This provision provides for the use of title I foreign currencies for financing the services of technicians, advisers, and administrators who are nationals of any friendly country, which may be needed to further economic and social development programs in other friendly countries. It is opposed by the Department of Agriculture in its letter of August 28, reporting on the committee amendments to S. 1748.

APPROPRIATION ACT REQUIREMENT

Page 3, line 24 through page 4, line 6 of committee amendments (par. (13) of S. 1711):

This provision limits the use of foreign currencies for the subsections specified by it to amounts specified in appropriation acts. The use specified in subsection (p) is not a new use and is already subject to such a limitation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] desires to address the Senate today. He could obtain time in his own right by offering an amendment to the committee amendments. However, I wonder if it would not be possible to vote upon the remaining committee amendments, as agreed to between the distinguished chairman, the senior Senator from Minnesota, and other Senators. Then, instead of yielding 10 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas, I would ask unanimous consent that he be granted 10 minutes following the vote. Otherwise I could yield him 10 minutes at this time, under the time limitation provided in the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I should like to hear the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, and I am glad to join in the request of the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the remaining committee amendments, beginning on page 2, line 17, and extending through line 8 on page 4.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, as I understand, the agreement is that the Senator from Arkansas may have whatever time is available to the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Does that mean that when the Senator from Arkansas has concluded, the Senate will resume consideration of the pending bill under the time limitation contained in the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

"THE UGLY AMERICAN"

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, as everyone knows, a book may sometimes create a pattern of thinking or a viewpoint among a people. It may be a good book or an inferior one, true or false, veracious or venal. It may be helpful to the Nation or harmful to it.

Chief among recent books to affect the point of view of many Americans concerning our conduct of foreign relations and the men who conduct them in the field is "The Ugly American," by William J. Lederer and Eugene Burdick.

Messrs. Lederer and Burdick have directed a stream of oversimplified and sensational criticism at the directors of our program of foreign aid in southeast Asia. This does a number of harmful things simultaneously. It heartens those Americans who detest foreign aid and who use these criticisms as an argument for the abandonment of such aid to Asian countries. It coarsely brushes aside the extraordinary, delicate, and novel complexities of the immense problem of Asian foreign aid. And it hinders a serious, unemotional examination of the manner in which aid should be handled.

"The Ugly American" is fiction.

This book was written as fiction—

The authors say. Then they add:

But it is based on fact

This, I take it, means that a fictional book ought not be regarded as fiction, but as fact. And the authors, anxious to parade fiction as fact, conclude their book with a 15-page "factual" epilog. Here they outline what they consider to be the "facts" about our foreign-aid activities in southeast Asia and the men who carry on the work there. But in this so-called factual epilog the authors of a book about the concrete subject of foreign aid nowhere make it clear that they are substituting fiction for fact.

According to the authors of "The Ugly American" if only our officers in the field took their advice, they would become personally popular and their country would wield great political power. That is, if our foreign-aid officials should become backslappers, baby kissers, and all around good fellows, the influence of the United States would increase over the vast reaches of the Pacific. More than that, our omniscient authors who are apparently willing to tackle everything but truth, lay down specific instructions how our foreign-aid officials can greatly help the United States in Asia. Here are a few items from the recipe for success according to Lederer and Burdick:

First. Our diplomats ought to be better trained.

Second. They ought to be able to speak Laotian, Cambodian, Vietnamese, and other extraordinarily difficult languages of southern Asia. It does not matter to our all-knowing authors that these languages, while difficult to acquire, are spoken by relatively small numbers of people and are of no value elsewhere in Asia or in the world to the men who might have acquired them only through years of work. Neither does it matter that Congress persistently refuses to give the State Department enough money to provide adequate language training.

Third. Our diplomats would also do better, say our authors, if they stopped getting drunk. This reckless charge is not documented presumably because our authors are intent upon showing that theirs is indeed a work of fiction.

Fourth. If our diplomats left the cities for the villages, they would do better, we are told, although how and why they would do better is not convincingly stated. Neither is it stated how a diplomat can carry on business with a government—which is his job—if he is in a village and the government is in the capital city. It would make as much sense to say that an ambassador to the United States ought to forsake Washington for Pocatello, Idaho.

Fifth. It would also be helpful to the general cause, one learns, if our foreign representatives were all missionaries and technicians instead of what our authors scornfully call bureaucrats.

Sixth. Much improvement to Asia and the United States would ensue if our representatives devoted themselves to breeding better chickens instead of constructing roads, dams, and irrigation works.

Seventh. But the greatest good would flow from one thing—if only our technicians in the fields would remove themselves to the villages, renounce personal sanitation, and live in disease-infected areas under disease conducive conditions so that they would become weakened by dysentery, their wives riddled by fever, and their children doomed to a sickly childhood or death.

Eighth. While living in the villages, during bouts of fever, the technicians, say our authors, could do a number of useful things that would enable them partially to earn their keep. They could describe to the local people the evils of communism and the beauties of democracy, read the books our enemies have written telling us in plain Russian or plain Chinese just how they intend to destroy us, and all the while conduct a 24-hour alert against spies.

This is the recommended recipe for winning southeast Asia to our side. It is, one must say, up to the authors' general standard of knowledge, wisdom, and mastery of international politics.

Sterile, devoid of insight, reckless and irresponsible, "The Ugly American" does nothing to help Americans overcome their perplexities with regard to the great and difficult questions of foreign aid. On the contrary, it merely contributes its own confusions to an already confused area of activity. Nor is this all.

Perniciously and dangerously, the book suggests that since we are engaged in a political struggle for which we have neither talent nor the will to win and indeed find it impossible to excel and distasteful to endure, only one course is open to us. That is to abandon the whole thing. Hence "The Ugly American" is actually a panic-stricken American in hysterical retreat from a job that he finds too tough to handle.

If this is a false and shameful conclusion to a false and in many ways shameful book, it is an inevitable conclusion because of the basic contradiction of the whole book; namely, that while written as fiction but presumably based upon fact, it does not state the facts and fails to be fiction.

Nowhere in the so-called factual epilog do the authors give us the source of their so-called facts. Nowhere do they prove, or undertake to prove, the numerous charges they make against our aid program in southeast Asia. Their sole stated sources are two. One is a quotation from the New York Times. One is an excerpt from a speech by the late Secretary of States Dulles.

In only one place do the authors attempt to explain the fictional conditions under which one of their own heroes moves. This man is named Tom Knox. He is a fictional chicken expert in Indochina and our authors apparently seem to believe that the road to American success in southeast Asia is paved with chickens. Chickens seem, indeed, to obsess them. In any event, the chicken expert Tom Knox, for reasons never stated, is a man of such consequence to us that the French go to great pains to corrupt him.

The Tom Knox story is accompanied by a curiously arrogant statement on the part of the authors.

We tried to point out—

They say—

the fact that we spend billions on the wrong aid projects while overlooking the almost costless and far more helpful ones. Most American technicians are involved in the planning and execution of projects: dams, highways, irrigation systems.

Who said the projects are wrong? Why none others than Lederer and Burdick. This is their opinion and they are certainly entitled to express it; but if they are serious about it, they ought also to try to document it instead of letting it stand as nothing but a dogmatic and arbitrary assertion. But Lederer and Burdick do not name any project. They do not name any country. They do not cite one figure.

They do—glibly—tell us why a project is good only if it is small. They list projects they regard as good and allude to native economists who allegedly supplied them information on the subject. But they name no economist, just as television hucksters say "890 doctors use it" without citing the name and credentials of a single doctor. From what country do these so-called native economists come? What are their credentials by way of scholarship and achievement? Again we are left in the dark; the dark that seems so congenial to our authors.

Although the native economists remain anonymous, they do give us some invaluable information through the instrumentality of Lederer and Burdick. Communism, they say, can be made to lose its appeal to Asians. How? The answer is so simple that if we Americans had had a grain of sense we would have ascertained the method for ourselves without waiting for the authors of "The Ugly American" to discover it and toss it off just like that. How, then, may communism be made to lose its appeal?

By improving chicken and pig breeding, extending men's knowledge of commercial fishing and food canning, developing better seeds, building small paper making plants, encouraging the growth of small, light industries. Such projects we are told by our self-appointed experts "would not only make friends, while costing little, but are also prerequisites to industrialization and economic independence for Asia."

"The Ugly American" shies from hard fact and hard thinking. What is meant by "village-size papermaking plants"? Does the creation of small industries come within the category of "almost costless" aid projects?

We are told that we do not have small projects in southeast Asia. Such a conclusion could have been arrived at only by men who have confused fact and fiction and who are so reckless, so intellectually lazy, that they have not taken the pains to ascertain what we are actually doing in southeast Asia.

For the fact is this: Most of our projects in southeast Asia are small projects. The more one ponders the contents of "The Ugly American" the more one realizes that it is the authors of this book—not the American people—who need enlightenment.

They could have learned a great deal about American aid programs in southeast Asia without ever leaving Honolulu. They had only to read the "Report of Overseas Operations of the U.S. Government," submitted to the Senate by our distinguished colleague from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] in 1957 and printed as Senate Document No. 31 of the 85th Congress. This report reveals how we have been spending foreign aid funds. It also reveals, by indirection, the abysmal ignorance of Lederer and Burdick.

Consider, for example, Thailand. The Ellender report lists 99 projects, of which 91 involved dollar expenditures and 8 local currency—baht—expenditures, in this country of 20 million people in a period of 6 years. Certainly a project in a country of this size upon which there is expended $1 million in 6 years could hardly be called big. Of the 91 projects in Thailand, involving dollar expenditures, 68 are in this group.

Of the 68, 28 cost less than $100,000, 15 cost less than $50,000, 5 cost less than $10,000.

What do these projects comprise? They comprise precisely those items which Lederer and Burdick say we ignore. By way of aiding Thailand's fishing industry, we built 4,000 small, private fish ponds and an adequate number of fish hatcheries. We improved the country's fish marketing facilities and raised the quality of its dried, smoked, and salted fish. Thus at small expense, American aid has brought Thailand an immense source of low-cost, high-protein food for domestic use and export.

Thailand is one of Asia's great rice producers. Here we have grown more than 5,000 varieties of Thai and foreign rice for observation and yield tests to ascertain those best suited for various areas of the country. We have supplied the Thai people with better breeds of poultry, hogs, and cattle, raised their soil fertility, and restored fallow land. Also, we have taught them to make better use of available fertilizers, fight animal and plant diseases, obtain sanitary water and protect their forests. Day after day our technicians employ dozens of small projects in agricultural and community development as pilot plants for instructing the Thai people in the use of methods that will enable them fully to exploit the natural resources of their country.

So much for the small projects in Thailand. What of the big projects? One of them—irrigation and land reclamation—costs as much as $3 million over a 6-year period. The most costly—highway development—required a total contribution by us of less than $17 million by the end of 1956.

"The Ugly American" is silent about South Vietnam. Perhaps the reason is that none of its generalizations apply in this country where there is no rising tide of antagonism. The Communists still control North Vietnam. But they have not taken South Vietnam, although only 5 years ago nearly everyone conceded it to them. Far from taking that country, Communists suffered a disastrous defeat there in the period 1954 to 1956. This is of great significance. For it was the first defeat inflicted on communism in Asia with entirely political weapons.

Long before "The Ugly American" was concocted, our aid administrators and technicians had done a superb job in South Vietnam. But it is characteristic of the spirit of the authors of this book that although they consistently deride the works of our foreign aid administrators in southeast Asia they do not acknowledge the fine work done by these men in South Vietnam.

There, our program is similar to that which we have been pursuing in Thailand, with this exception: Considerable sums were necessarily spent to repair the country's war-damaged transportation system and for refugee resettlement occasioned by the Indochina war. This reduced the money available for small projects. Yet when we turn to the Ellender report, we find that of 63 projects described by it, at least 50 are small by any standard—that is, less than $300,000 over the 3-year period, 1954 to 1956.

Here the effort has been to recultivate abandoned land, repair small canals and irrigation works, build roads between villages and towns, and improve crops and livestock through inexpensive technical assistance. What is the result of all this?

There has been a steady increase in the production of rice, vegetables, fruits, coffee, tea. For the first time in 200 years this area will be self-supporting in rice. And the cost of many of these efforts is largely borne by the Vietnamese themselves, even down to the village level.

In the villages one will find an ample supply of small pumps. Perhaps the authors of "The Ugly American" would be surprised by this. For, according to them, their man Homer Atkins had to invent pumps for Sarkhan when he worked in that mythical country doing foreign aid.

Lederer and Burdick assure us that the almost costless projects are the ones for us to pursue in southeast Asia. Well, if this is the criterion, the Communists would have little chance in the southeast Asia that we have honeycombed with small projects.

Let me repeat that Lederer and Burdick disdain fact. Thus they say:

> We do not need the horde of 1,500,000 Americans, mostly amateurs, who are now working for the United States overseas.

This is an exaggeration of the fact by about 40 times. There are about 40,000 American civilians working for the United States overseas. More than half of them—some 21,000—are employed by the Department of Defense.

About 1,200 American civilians are employed in the entire Far East by the International Cooperation Administration—the agency that administers foreign aid. About 1,200 more work under various ICA contracts—mostly with universities—and another 1,200 for the Department of State. In addition, 330 persons are employed by the Overseas Information Service—USIA.

Hence, there are less than 4,000 Americans working for our Government in the Far East, other than employees of the Defense Department, and a little more than half of them are stationed in southeast Asia.

These 2,000 officials and technicians—a number somewhat less than the so-called horde of 1,500,000 Americans whom Lederer and Burdick say work for us abroad—are nonetheless held responsible for our allegedly poor aid operations, and are prejudged as culprits in the event of future Communist success in southeast Asia.

Let us now turn to some of the remarkable so-called true stories that occur in "The Ugly American"; stories as preposterous as the fiction of the book.

Here it is said that a conference was held in Hong Kong at which U.S. representatives tried to persuade neutralist Asian countries to stockpile thermonuclear weapons.

What American agency convened this conference? What Americans represented us there? Who asked Laos, Cambodia, and Thailand to stockpile thermonuclear weapons? We are not told. Yet this is a sensational charge against all members of the Government, including the President and the Congress, who conduct our foreign relations.

What authority is there for the statement that a tough and confident Jewish union negotiator headed an American diplomatic delegation at an international meeting devoted to military affairs? Who was the union negotiator? How did he come to head an American diplomatic delegation? Where was the international meeting held? The authors do not tell us.

What authority is there for the statement that India is neutral because one of our diplomats accredited to an Asian country had no idea of what he was doing? The authors do not say. It obviously did not occur to them—or did it—that India is neutral because the Indians want it that way.

We have noted the insistence of Lederer and Burdick that the salvation for American foreign aid in Asia lies in operating small projects. If this is true, how do our cocksure authors reconcile this with the fact that India, the greatest of the uncommitted countries, needs big projects. They do not attempt to reconcile the irreconcilable. When the facts cannot be stretched to suit their feverish fiction, they simply avoid the subject.

But it is clear that Indian economic improvement awaits the construction of large industries, great dams, highways, and small and large irrigation systems. This is not lost upon the Russians, even if it is ignored by "The Ugly American." In 1959, for example, a Russian-built steel mill with a capacity of 1 million tons a year and costing $275 million was officially opened in India.

It is in keeping with the general bias of this book that it does not mention the many Americans who have worked many years in the Indian countryside and in Indian villages on small projects.

Burma is one of the few nonfictional countries mentioned in "The Ugly American." In Burma there was at least one American, according to our authors, who was trying to save the country from communism. Naturally this man is not a U.S. Government official. He is Father Finian, a Catholic priest who, we are told, has taken on the huge task of defeating communism even if he had to do it alone.

He ignores the fact that in this struggle he is a Johnny-come-lately, since the Burmese had been fighting bloodily against communism ever since 1948 when the Communists tried to capture Burma at gunpoint. He does not seem to know they had fought successfully against great odds. Nor does he know they had already defeated the Communists when Finian, out to save them, "crystallized his plan of attack."

Here again "The Ugly American" distorts history and misrepresents the brave, successful struggle of an Asian people recently emerged from a desperate war against the Japanese and only newly come into independent sovereignty to save their hard-won freedom by victory against their would-be Communist destroyers.

Nowhere do Lederer and Burdick mention Burma's political parties, her Government, her officials, her army, her gallant efforts to build a society based upon democracy. They do recommend that Americans study communism's evils by studying Karl Marx. But they fail to say that Burma's leaders became acquainted with these evils the hard way; when Communist activities threatened their lives, their political aspirations, the new-found freedom of their country.

What does "The Ugly American" tell us about the war in Indochina? The authors say they "could find no American—or French—military or civilian official who had read the overall Communist operation plan contained in "The Selected Works of Mao-tse Tung." Our military missions, they say, "advised, and the French went down into defeat without having studied Mao's writings."

Lederer and Burdick have the cockiness of their ignorance. Thus, in a dispatch to the New York Times of November 15, 1958, which details French Army opposition to de Gaulle, the newspaper's chief foreign correspondent, C. L. Sulzberger, says:

> The army's professional cadres are dominated by men who fought through the unsuccessful Indochina campaign and, in the process, studied the tactics of Mao-tse Tung and his Vietminh friends. Without accepting Mao's ideology, they are deeply impressed by his methods of infiltrating civilian populations.

In the world of Lederer and Burdick almost everything is reduced to idiot simplicity. The truth, however, is more complex. No matter how many books the French might have read, victory would elude them so long as they lacked the one element indispensable to winning: namely, sufficient support from the local people of the area. Nonetheless, the Indochinese war affords Lederer and Burdick another opportunity to advance their warped thesis for American success in foreign policy; that it will flow from the use of tricks and wiles and learning our enemies' secrets.

"The Ugly American" owes much of its box office success to the use of tricks and wiles by its authors, but this is small recommendation for the employment of such a method in conducting the foreign affairs of the United States.

I now turn with relief from this murky book to a recent report published in Newsweek for August 31, 1959, and written by its distinguished correspondent, Ernest K. Lindley. Noting the favorable tide he had found on his survey of 17 Asian countries, he says:

> My concern is about current and possible future mistakes that might reverse this tide.
> The worst general mistake is to pay attention to such a preposterous book as "The Ugly American," grotesque cartoon of a few misfits and errors of the past. Some of its suggestions for improving American operations in Asia are out of date—already having been put into effect. Some are ridiculous. At the same time, it ignores some of the things Asians most need from us. As a result, anyone who takes this book seriously is misinformed about the present situation and badly advised as to the future.

"The Ugly American" has been a best-seller among us. For some strange reason many Americans revel in American-made slanders of our own public servants. But how do Asians regard this book? This is Mr. Lindley's answer to the question:

> Few free Asians I saw on this trip had read this book. They were too intelligent to take it seriously, although some remarked that it furnished propaganda for our common enemies, and one noted that it was insulting to Asians. The distinguished Thai editor, Kukrit Pramoj, has written an urbane reply. He calls it "The Loud and Beautiful American." Due to appear in the September number of Pacifica, it deserves an audience throughout America.

Then Mr. Lindley says:

> It is the effect of "The Ugly American" on Americans, including some members of Congress and certain sections of the press, which disturbs a U.S. observer just returned from Asia.

It was inevitable perhaps that this book of grotesque slander should seem to offer moneymaking opportunities to some of the scavengers of Hollywood. The prospect alarms Mr. Lindley and he writes:

> One shudders to think how many more people, here and throughout the world, may be misled by the movie version.

"The Ugly American" is a coarse cartoon of our foreign aid activities and the men who conduct them in southeast Asia. It follows that the movie version of the book will, in all probability, be even coarser. Hence I share Mr. Lindley's fears that the movie will be harmful to us everywhere, and my apprehensions are the greater by virtue of the script of the forthcoming movie.

I have been told upon excellent authority that one of the producers of the movie said:

> This is our story line. Here is this lush shacked up with a Eurasian dame to whom he spills American secrets.

Translating this from Hollywood language, this means that the U.S. Ambassador to a southeast Asian country is a drunkard who has a Eurasian mistress to whom he betrays secrets of our foreign policy. Thus our Ambassador is pictured as a drunkard, a lecher, and a traitor. I do not see how anyone could more effectively discredit this country—especially in the eyes of Asians—than through the production of such a film. But it is apparently enough for the producers that they can make money out of it even at the cost of their country for, as the phrase is, it will have everything: (a) An exotic tropical background, (b) a high-placed American rotting in the Tropics, (c) an attractive Asian—or Hollywood actress portraying an Asian—actress for purposes of playing up the box office attractions of sex in the Tropics.

Nor is this all. The producers of the movie are not merely content to make a movie which will traduce the United States through the medium of a book that traduces it. They also have the arrogance to insist that the Department of State cooperate with them on location so that they may produce their wretched film with the greatest speed, economy, and authenticity of diplomatic usage if nothing else.

I hope that the Department of State will deny its cooperation to men who deserve well neither of it nor of the United States

Let me turn again to Mr. Ernest K. Lindley and his reports to Newsweek about conditions in free Asia as he had found them a few weeks ago. He makes these points.

First:

> Our policy of extending economic and technical aid, with no political strings attached, to the neutralist countries has improved their attitude toward us:

Second:

> With the completion of some projects which took several years, the results of our economic-aid program are more visible and more widely appreciated. We have made mistakes * * * but our overall aid program is a successs.

Third:

Gradually we have built up a corps of people who understand the various Asian peoples and we have won their confidence. Officially we are well represented. * * * We have a competent lot of Ambassadors in Asia, and some are very, very good. USIS has many very capable and experienced man, and I was favorably impressed with scores of other official Americans I met.

Mr. Lindley concludes his observations with a statement that gives the lie both to "The Ugly American" and the projected movie that will mirror it. He says:

It is time to discard the ugly fiction that we have bungled in Asia. We have made our mistakes but, on the whole, our policies are sound, reasonably well executed, and productive of heartening results.

At this point, Mr. President, I wish to say how much I am indebted to Mr. Joseph Buttinger for his analysis of "The Ugly American" from which I have liberally borrowed. The author of a study of Indochinese history entitled "The Smaller Dragon," he is an active figure in the International Rescue Committee, and has worked hard to help political refugees in Asia and Europe. He is also chairman of the Executive Committee of the American Friends of Vietnam, and was conference chairman of a meeting held in Washington in April 1959, to consider the theme of "Aid to Vietnam: An American Success Story." Mr. Buttinger's devasating analysis of "The Ugly American" appeared in the summer, 1959, issue of Dissent.

The mischief of "The Ugly American" is that it caters to the parochialism, and the frustration of the American people. A perfectly natural reaction to reading the book—a reaction which is greatly encouraged by such things as the President's veto of the public works bill—is to ask why we must build dams abroad, when we cannot build them at home. There are two things wrong with this question. In the first place, it is based on the fallacious assumption that we have to choose between dams abroad and dams at home. We are rich enough to have both if we really want them. In the second place, the question ignores the fact that if our foreign policy fails, we certainly cannot build dams at home—or very much else, except missile-launching sites. The question overlooks all the domestic public works projects which had to be postponed during World War II and the Korean war. The real answer to the question is that the best way to be sure we can develop this country as we see fit is to be sure, first, that we are living in a free and secure world.

The task of building a free and secure world is enormously subtle, complicated, and expensive. It is no wonder that for more than a decade the American people have been suffering from a kind of mass frustration which is never very far below the surface. We are an impatient people, given to seeing things in black and white, anxious to get on with whatever job needs doing. When the job does not go so well as we think it should—or when it takes longer than we like—it is easy to get the feeling that there must be some reason why we are not making more headway. A few years ago, the phony and demagogic explanation was that the State Department was full of Communists. Now it is that ICA is full of incompetents. I suppose this is progress, of sorts. At least, we have advanced from questioning the patriotism, to simply questioning the intelligence, of our public servants.

Mr. President, there are reasons why we are not making more headway in our foreign policy. One is the magnitude and complexity of the problems we face. Another is that we, as a people, are poorly prepared to deal with problems of this character. A third is that our attention is constantly being diverted from the real reasons for our difficulties by loud public outcries over irrelevant or even nonexistent shortcomings.

It is the duty of responsible publicists to highlight, illuminate, and explain the real reasons for our lack of progress and our frustration. It is a grave and harmful disservice when those who command a national audience merely exploit the phony reasons.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I desire to express my commendation of the Senator from Arkansas for his fine presentation of a problem about which each of us should be thinking. I commend him for his courage in dealing so bluntly with it. Frequently, I think how important it is for those of us who have been gifted with the right of free speech and a free press to impose voluntary restrictions upon what we say. Everyone in this country is permitted—subject to the action of libel or the action of slander—to write and to speak his thoughts; but that extraordinary liberty imposes upon the will of the individual extraordinary restrictions.

If the book referred to does not tell the truth, although impliedly it may be a libel on some persons, the truth is that it is a libel on the people of the United States and the Government of the United States. An individual who is libeled can sue. But what can the Government do about that? It can do nothing; we have to bear it.

The impression sought to be established by the Communists is that the people of the United States are a debauched, drunken, licentious, irresponsible people; that is the technique of the Marxists, and they have succeeded in a substantial degree in spreading throughout the world their lies about what they allege to be the "irresponsibility of the Americans." I am unwilling to concede any of that.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The sad fact is that the United States itself, by means of the motion picture, is going to spread that feeling abroad. Can the Senator from Ohio think of anything that the Russians could do that would be more damaging to the prestige of the United States?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time available to the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Arkansas may proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—although I shall not object—this should be an opportunity for us to get along with a whole fistful of amendments to a very important piece of proposed legislation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I believe that I will object; and I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. ELLENDER obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me 3 minutes on the bill, in order that I may refer to the matter which recently has been under discussion?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized for 3 minutes on the pending bill.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I wish to congratulate the Senator from Arkansas, who, in his responsibility as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, has come to grips with a matter which I believe has been disturbing to every Member of the Senate, every Member of the House of Representatives, and, doubtless, thousands of other patriotic Americans.

I think his use of the words "false and shameful," as applicable to the book entitled "The Ugly American," which he has mentioned, is a restraint in the use of terms which long since should have been publicly used, because in my opinion that book verges on the treasonable and the traitorous, and seeks to discredit some of the finest people we have, and seeks to discredit this great Nation, which wants nothing but peace, and seeks to discredit its generosity.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Furthermore, just think of the effect such a motion picture could have.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Arkansas that such a motion picture issued as a production of the United States of America would be even more harmful, because although the book probably would not be translated into hundreds of languages, so that it might be read all over the world, the motion picture might easily be shown on screens all over the world, and be interpreted as a faithful reproduction, by American mechanical genius, of the thinking of our people.

I certainly think the Senator from Arkansas has done a fine thing in making this presentation.

Let me say, also, that I think Mr. Ernest Lindley has rendered a splendid service by making a careful survey, on the spot, of the scene supposedly covered by the book "The Ugly American," and then in writing the various fine articles which he has written, so as to make it perfectly clear that, as a seasoned observer, he regards the book as a diatribe and a libel upon both the objectives and the performance of this generous Nation.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me for 30 seconds?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from Florida.

I believe the American people should keep two things in mind, in regard to the ICA: In the first place, ICA law is so drafted as to make it very difficult for the ICA employees to have tenure for any length of time—which makes extremely difficult the selection of the personnel, in the first place.

In the second place, I think a remarkably fine job has been done in selecting the personnel of the ICA. Let us not forget that the ICA personnel who, in various parts of the world, are trying to carry out that program, day in and day out, 24 hours every day, are constantly risking their own health. I think that often we do not sufficiently appreciate the great risks the ICA personnel run; and I believe it is time that a word be spoken here on the floor of the Senate in their defense.

I am glad the Senator from Arkansas has done so today; and I wish to associate myself, as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, with his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time yielded has expired.

EXTENSION OF AGRICULTURAL TRADE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1954

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1748) to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], on page 5, being title IV.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to say just a brief word in regard to this amendment: In light of some of the action previously taken by the Senate, particularly as relates to the title of the bill, I believe this amendment is not needed.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ELLENDER. I had understood the Senate had adopted those amendments a while ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All amendments except the one to title 4 have been agreed to. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment relating to title 4.

Does the Senator yield back his time?

Mr. ELLENDER. Has the Senator offered his amendment to title 4?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. ELLENDER. Is that the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question.

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield myself 2 minutes.

This provision authorizes the President to carry out Public Law 480 and section 402 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954 either directly or through an administrator designated by him. The administrator would perform his functions under the general supervision and direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Public Law 480 programs have a wide impact on many U.S. Government programs. Under the present administrative organization, the interests of these programs are taken into account through two interagency committees: First, the Francis Committee, which deals with policy considerations, and second, the Interagency Staff Committee led by the Department of Agriculture, which develops and coordinates individual programs and conducts the day-to-day operations. This has been an effective means of developing programs which emphasize full utilization of surpluses and the attainment of broad U.S. objectives. The proposed provision, if it does anything, and I am not sure that it does, would complicate rather than facilitate these activities.

As I stated a moment ago in agreeing to the amendments offered, beginning on line 17 on page 2 down to line 6 on page 4, it was my understanding that title 4 would be eliminated from the amendments.

I therefore ask that the Senate vote down title 4, which is now before the Senate.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I listened to what the Senator from Louisiana earlier said when we agreed to an amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota. He specifically stated that there was an agreement made that the title would not be amended.

Mr. ELLENDER. That title IV would be eliminated.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If there was such an agreement made, how does the amendment now come before the Senate?

Mr. ELLENDER. From a parliamentary standpoint, it has to be done in that way.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I assure the Senator from Ohio we agreed to forego it. It was necessary to offer it under the parliamentary situation. Title IV is nothing but permissive authority which, under the Reorganization Act, the President already has.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I call up my amendment identified as "9–3–59—A," and ask to have it read as modified. It was intended to be three different amendments, and was inadvertently printed as one. I ask that it be stated as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 2, to strike out lines 1 through 3 and insert the following:

(3) Section 203 of such Act is amended, effective January 1, 1960, by striking out the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof:

"Not more than $300,000,000 (including the Corporation's investment in such commodities) plus any amount by which transfers made in the preceding calendar year have called or will call for appropriations to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation in amounts less than could have been expended during such preceding year under this title as in effect during such preceding year shall be expended in any calendar year during the period January 1, 1960, and ending December 31, 1962, for all such transfers and for other costs authorized by this title."

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, this amendment would repair an omission in the committee's amendments to S. 1748, which extend title II for 3 years instead of the 1 year requested by the executive branch, but fail to provide more than the additional $300 million in funds requested by the executive branch as estimated to meet requirements for 1 year.

The wording of the amendment has been gone over with the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER]. It has also been approved by representatives of the administration. It is purely corrective.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. As I understand the original amendment submitted by the distinguished Senator from Vermont, it incorporated two other provisions amending other sections of the bill. Is that correct?

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct. They were inadvertently printed as one amendment.

Mr. ELLENDER. So that the amendment has been modified by striking out all on page 1 from line 1 to line 8, and on page 2, from line 10 to line 15. Is that correct?

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. Then the rest of the amendment has been modified so as to conform to what the Senate did Friday in extending the act for 3 years. Is that correct?

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. With that understanding, I have no objection to the amendment. I yield back my time.

Mr. AIKEN. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I offer an amendment. The committee was unanimously in favor of the particular amendment I am now offering.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed at the end of the bill to add the following new section:

SEC. 101. (a) In order to insure the nutritional value of cornmeal, grits, white rice, and white flour when such foods are made available for distribution under section 416 (3) of the Agricultural Act of 1949 or for distribution to schools under the National School Lunch Act or any other Act, such foods shall be enriched so as to meet the standards for enriched cornmeal, enriched corn grits, enriched rice, or enriched flour, as the case may be, prescribed in regulations promulgated under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act; and in order to protect the nutritional value and sanitary quality of such enriched foods during transportation and storage such foods shall be packaged in sanitary containers. For convenience and ease in handling, the weight of any sanitary container when filled shall not exceed fifty pounds.

(b) The term "sanitary container" means any container of such material and construction as (1) will not permit the infiltration of foreign matter into the contents of such container under ordinary conditions of shipping and handling, and (2) will not, for a period of at least one year, disintegrate so as to contaminate the contents of the container, necessitating the washing of the contents prior to use.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 201. As used in this title—

(a) The term "food commodity" means any food product raised or produced in the United States on farms, including agricultural, horticultural, and dairy products, livestock, poultry, and honey.

(b) The term "State" includes the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

(c) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Agriculture.

(d) The term "food stamp" means a certificate, coupon, or other similar medium of exchange issued to eligible recipients.

DEMONSTRATION PROGRAMS AUTHORIZED

SEC. 202. (a) The Secretary is authorized and directed, as soon as practicable after the date of enactment of this Act, to formulate and administer in geographically dispersed areas of the United States demonstration food stamp allotment programs under which food commodities will be made available to persons with low incomes, unemployed persons, and such other persons as the Secretary determines to be in need of the type of assistance made available under such programs.

(b) Demonstration food stamp allotment programs authorized by subsection (a) shall be administered by the Secretary in not less than three nor more than six different areas of the United States, and shall, to the extent practicable, be administered in areas determined by the Secretary of Labor to be areas of surplus labor. In carrying out the provisions of this section the Secretary shall provide for at least one such program in a rural area of the United States.

TYPES OF DEMONSTRATION PROGRAMS

SEC. 203. (a) The Secretary shall, with respect to the demonstration food stamp allotment program to be administered in any area, determine the type of program it is to be, the requirements of eligibility for participation therein, and the manner in which it is to be administered.

(b) In formulating and administering any demonstration food stamp allotment program pursuant to the provisions of this title the Secretary is authorized to consult and cooperate with appropriate State and local authorities as well as representatives of any private industry concerned with the operation of such program.

(c) The Secretary is authorized and directed in carrying out the provisions of this title to utilize such stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation (determined by the Secretary to be in surplus supply) as he shall deem fit.

RULES AND REGULATIONS

SEC. 204. The Secretary is authorized to promulgate such rules and regulations as he deems necessary to effectuate the provisions of this title.

TERMINATION OF PROGRAMS—REPORT TO CONGRESS

SEC. 205. (a) The demonstration food stamp allotment programs authorized by this title shall terminate prior to January 1, 1962.

(b) The Secretary shall, as soon as practicable after the termination of such programs, submit to the Congress a final report on the operation of such programs, including such recommendation as he deems appropriate. The Secretary may also from time to time make such earlier reports to the Congress as he deems appropriate.

APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 206. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated $20,000,000 for carrying out the demonstration food stamp allotment programs.

MAINTENANCE OF OTHER ASSISTANCE

SEC. 207. Receipt by any person of benefits under this title shall not be deemed to be income or resources under the provisions of the Social Security Act or any other Federal legislation pertaining to the security of the aged, blind, disabled, dependent children, unemployed, or other similar groups. Any State or local subdivision thereof which decreases the cash or other assistance extended to any person or group as a consequence of the assistance made available under this title shall be ineligible for further participation under this title.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, this amendment would require cornmeal, grits, white rice, and white flour distributed pursuant to section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1941 or to schools to be enriched so as to meet the standards for enrichment prescribed by the Food and Drug Administration and to be packaged in sanitary containers not exceeding 50 pounds.

The amendment is a somewhat expanded version of S. 651, which I introduced on January 23. Hearings were held on S. 651 and other bills by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on April 24.

The 100-pound bags now used for rice donated to schools are too heavy for the women who prepare the school lunches to handle. They tear and admit dirt and moisture, both in transportation and in winter, and they must be dragged along the floor.

In South Carolina and in some other States, State law requires that cereal grain be enriched before the grain is sold. The food that we furnish our schoolchildren should be clean and free from foreign substance and of high nutritional value.

It will be found, according to the report of the Department of Agriculture that this provision will cost between $200,000 and $250,000.

That would mean it would cost about one-fourth of 1 percent of what we are spending at the present time on our school lunch program. It would also provide for the resacking necessary to carry out the program.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. As I understand, there would be no change, except to make certain additions to the enrichment program, and to provide for more practical packaging, as the Senator pointed out. Is that the case?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. That is true. This is not a new program. We already enrich about 80 percent of the foods we furnish under the school lunch program.

If there are no further questions, Mr. President, I am willing to yield back my time.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. First I wish to say to the Senator that as he knows, this matter was considered very seriously in the committee. It was approved twice unanimously in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Surely this is a well-deserved part of the proposed legislation. It is a part of the general amendment which we considered Friday evening. We divided the amendment, to let the enrichment provision stand on its own, and it certainly ought to be agreed to.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I do not rise particularly to participate in the debate regarding the amendments, but I should like to make some remarks regarding the extension of Public Law 480.

Mr. President, the American farmer is the world's largest exporter of food and fiber and for that reason plays an important part in our economic program.

I cannot stress too strongly the importance of extending Public Law 480, and I approve the 3-year extension recommended by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

It occurs to me that this must be more than a program on an annual basis, and I can see real advantage in having it on an extended basis. In other words, the disposal of surplus food and fiber is important to agriculture not only now, but also, in my opinion, will be important to agriculture for years to come.

The export of farm commodities means not only dollars for farmers, but it has been and will continue to be an important part of a program of bringing closer relationships with countries that do not have an abundant food supply.

"Food for Peace" must be more than just a slogan, it can and must be a reality. It is for that reason that I supported the proposal of the Senator from Minnesota

[Mr. HUMPHREY] when the bill was before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Last year we exported crops from 50 million acres of cropland. Our Nation must continue to expand its export market of these farm products.

I do not like to delve into statistics, but it is interesting to note that slightly less than 20 percent of the total volume of all farm products similar to those produced in the United States entered into world trade.

We exported about one-half of our cotton produced, two-fifths of our wheat and rice, one-third of our soy beans and tobacco, one-third of the tallow produced in this country, and one-sixth of our lard output.

At the present time we have a number of surplus disposal programs. Under Public Law 480, the Agriculture Trade Development and Assistance Act, we have had programs under which we could sell our surpluses for foreign currency, donate them to foreign countries for emergency relief, distribute them to private agencies, to hungry people at home and abroad and barter them for strategic materials.

Thirty-eight countries have participated in the Public Law 480 programs. Under title I, which allows surplus sales for local currencies, India has received $544 million, Yugoslavia $341 million, Spain $276 million, Pakistan $240 million and Brazil $155 million from U.S. surplus stocks.

Through our mutual security program we are distributing our agricultural commodities at the rate of $175 million per year. This $175 million was continued for another year in the authorization bill which is before Congress.

Many are asking why it has not been possible to make greater use of the ever-increasing surpluses, particularly wheat. I think it should be mentioned that there are three principal reasons.

First. The most important is the problem of competition. This makes a real problem in dealing particularly with our Canadian neighbors to the north who also have great surpluses of wheat.

Recently the Canadian Chamber of Commerce complained that the United States was using subsidized flour as an economic weapon to displace Canada from second place as a supplier to the new West Indies Federation.

Second. Another problem we have in moving this food to foreign countries is the inability of many of the underdeveloped countries to handle incoming shipments.

For instance, we send a shipload of American wheat to India every day, but India's ports are so congested that it is impossible to secure immediate handling of our shipments.

Many suggestions have been made that improved unloading and handling facilities at the docks be arranged, but these suggestions have met opposition from the Indian Government because of the great surplus of labor, and therefore, the unloading is done mostly by hand.

In addition to this problem, we have the problem of inadequate storage and distribution facilities in most of the underdeveloped countries.

Third. Congress must appropriate money to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation for stocks that are removed and distributed for food in needy countries.

Many of us on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee had hoped that we might increase substantially the amount of money available for food through the mutual aid progam, but evidence was presented to our committee which indicated that the present authorization of $175 million was about all that could be used, based on the facilities that the underdeveloped countries had for receiving and distributing this food.

From a humanitarian standpoint, I know of nothing we can do as a Nation which will win friends faster and more permanently than getting food and fiber into the hands of the needy.

While it is essential that we maintain programs of military assistance, defense support and economic aid, it is, in my opinion, equally important that we continue to build good will and friendship, based on our Nation's Christian teachings and background that we are "our brother's keeper."

Our military strength, our great national production through the private enterprise system, and the humanitarian aspects of our people, by giving aid to those who are less fortunate, have placed us in an enviable position among the nations.

I thank the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I yield back my time, unless there are further questions concerning the amendment.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Senators will recall that last Friday the Senate voted down an amendment, which included both the enrichment and food stamp programs.

I have discussed the matter with the distinguished Senator from South Carolina. As the Senator stated, the Agriculture Committee was unanimous in its approval of the enrichment program. As the Senator further stated, 80 percent of the food is already being enriched. This would complete the job.

Although I do not believe such an amendment should be attached to Public Law 480, since we are dealing with surplus agricultural commodities and since the amendment is to attach itself solely to surplus commodities, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Does the Senator yield back his remaining time?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new title:

DEMONSTRATION FOOD STAMP ALLOTMENT PROGRAMS

Types of demonstration programs

(b) The Secretary shall, as soon as practicable after the termination of such programs, submit to the Congress a final report on the operation of such programs, including such recommendation as he deems appropriate. The Secretary may also from time to time make such earlier reports to the Congress as he deems appropriate.

Appropriations

SEC. 306. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated $15,000,000 for carrying out the demonstration food stamp allotment programs.

Maintenance of other assistance

SEC. 307. Receipt by any person of benefits under this title shall not be deemed to be income or resources under the provisions of the Social Security Act or any other Federal legislation pertaining to the security of the aged, blind, disabled, dependent children, unemployed, or other similar groups. Any State or local subdivision thereof which decreases the cash or other assistance extended to any person or group as a consequence of the assistance made available under this title shall be ineligible for further participation under this title.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the modified amendment is the second half of the amendment which included the enrichment provisions relating to certain surplus food commodities, agreed to by the Senate as offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON].

This particular amendment is offered on behalf of myself, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON]. It is the food stamp allotment plan on a very modest pilot project basis providing for food stamp plans in not less than three or more than six communities geographically dispersed. It provides a maximum sum of money to be allotted for this purpose of $15 million. It further provides that the supplies used shall be supplies in surplus, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The amendment itself is one which has been talked about, thought about, and worked on for a number of years. I have discussed the amendment this morning with a number of my colleagues. It is slightly different from the amendment which was offered as a package proposal on Friday evening. It would embrace the food stamp allotment and the food allotment plan on a modified and very limited basis, so that we could test out the feasibility of this kind of program, under the rules and regulations as prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, in not more than six nor less than three geographical areas.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Do I correctly understand the proposal which the Senator from Minnesota has offered as an amendment would be permissive, to be used in the discretion of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The program authorizes and directs the Secretary in regard to not less than three nor more than six communities. The supplies to be made available would be at the discretion of the Secretary.

The proposal would not be permissive, but it would authorize and direct the Secretary between now and 1962 to have a program in not less than three nor more than six areas. The supplies which would be used would have to be surplus supplies at the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, perhaps I misunderstood the matter, but I have discussed it in some detail with the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN]. I had understood from the Senator this was to be a permissive program only.

Mr. AIKEN. I will say that I had contemplated offering an amendment which would have been permissive. The amendment which is offered now would appear to be mandatory to the extent of three to six trial areas.

Mr. HUMPHREY. This is the provision in the bill as reported by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to the calendar.

Mr. AIKEN. I have not offered an amendment which is permissive.

The bill which I originally introduced, of which the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] were cosponsors, would have had the effect of being permissive, and would have provided a more complete program than the one now offered. The whole thing would have been permissive.

For the last 15 years I have urged that the Congress adopt legislation which would authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out a food allotment program, the extent of which would be determined by the Committee on Appropriations and the Secretary. The purposes of such a program would be threefold.

The first purpose would be to see that the 26 million people in this country whom we are told have inadequate diets would have enough to eat. Those people include those who are receiving old age assistance and survivors insurance, dependent children, permanently disabled persons, blind persons, general assistance beneficiaries, persons living in broken homes, and persons living on inadequate pensions and retirement funds.

The second purpose of the proposed legislation would be to get the Government out of competition with private industry, for while the sun is shining now, the time is coming when it will not shine so brightly—I am sure of that—and when that time comes, unless we are prepared to carry out a food allotment program in another way, we will find Government coming in wholesale in direct competition with the normal channels of trade.

The third purpose is to increase markets by increasing the quality of food which these 26 million people would use. It would increase, for instance, the use of dairy products by about 30 percent, and of citrus fruits and green vegetables by about 30 percent, and so on.

I never intended that it should be of a scope to cover the whole country, although the proposed legislation authorizes it if the need should arise. What I had hoped was that we would enact legislation which would authorize trial runs, pilot plants, or whatever the correct word would be in this case, so that when the time came we would know how to operate a national program.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the point is raised here about the scope of authorization on the larger bill which the Senator from Vermont introduced and the pending bill. The amendment authorizes and directs, because it is only a pilot plant project.

Mr. AIKEN. That is true, but I did not realize that. The amendment which I would have prepared would have been permissive only. However, the pending amendment, with which I will go along, strictly limits the amount which can be spent.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is correct.

Mr. AIKEN. It limits the period of time during which the experiment or the trial program can be operated.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It has a $15 million limitation. It covers a minimum of three areas and a maximum of six.

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. There is a time limit upon it as well. These provisions have to go to conference, but if we are ever going to try out a program, we just cannot have it permissive. We ought to at least given it a trial run, and that is all we are trying to do.

Mr. AIKEN. The House bill contains a provision which was adopted by a 2-to-1 vote, which provides for a very broad program, and for expenditures up to $1 billion a year.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is right.

Mr. AIKEN. It seems to me that we are not ready for such a broad program at this time. That is why I am supporting this proposal, which provides for three to six trial areas where this can be worked out.

We are doing it in the rural development program in up to 50-odd counties, I believe, and I am in favor of trying it out in other areas.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It seems to me that it is a necessary trial run, and it is quite limited, compared with the provisions in the House authorization, which was adopted by a 2-to-1 vote in the House. I cannot imagine the Senate, which has already approved this very same bill in a larger amount in committee, rejecting it.

Mr. AIKEN. This amendment is not as explicit as the bill which I have been introducing in company with the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Minnesota over a period of years, but I would hope that if this becomes law, the Secretary would carry out in general the procedure which is laid down in the bill, and I believe that if it is enacted, he would do so, because it handles these programs through the normal channels of trade, such as the local stores, and local banks. I should like to get away from the method whereby Government does everything, even to delivering the cornmeal and the flour and whatever else it has to the people who need it.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL and Mr. HOLLAND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Does the Senator yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I feel I should yield first to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Minnesota whether his proposal is permissive or mandatory insofar as it is being presented here.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The pending amendment is the same as the bill which was reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry as a separate bill under Calendar No. 664. It was handled in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and reported to the Senate and is now on the calendar. It is an authorization and a direction for a minimum of three and a maximum of six pilot plants, to the limited sum of $15 million.

Mr. AIKEN. May I add this. The trial areas selected would undoubtedly be areas where the Government is presently heavily involved in relief programs.

Mr. HUMPHREY. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. AIKEN. This will simply direct them to use another disposal method in a limited number of areas.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Exactly. The bill provides that priorities shall be given to what we call labor surplus areas, or to areas where there is a further need.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. To the extent the distinguished Senator has answered my question, it would be mandatory. Is that correct?

Mr. HUMPHREY. As to the three areas, that is correct, three to six.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator will realize that this subject matter has been handled in a rather loose way in committee and up to now on the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY. No. I disagree with the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. In committee the general principle was acquiesced in by the committee, and the matter was turned over to be drafted in the form of an amendment by counsel for the committee, the exact form to be approved by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN]. It was drafted. It was reported. Since that time I have had discussions with both Senators and with the chairman, the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] who was not present in committee when action of the type I have mentioned was taken.

This morning—and I ask particularly the attention of the Senator from Vermont to what I am about to say—in an effort to get together I discussed the matter not only with the Senator from Minnesota, but particularly with the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Louisiana, and my understanding from the Senator from Vermont was that the proposal was to be offered in the form of a permissive amendment, and I so repeated it to the chairman of the committee. The chairman of the committee and I—and I can speak only for ourselves, of course—had agreed to the adoption of such a permissive amendment insofar as we were concerned only, fully knowing that we had in conference a difficult problem ahead of us, and fully knowing that we had a huge program already in being.

The latest report of the Department shows that about 4¾ million citizens received food under the existing program in June of this year. Speaking only for myself, I thought that if we made available to the Department an opportunity to try out this food stamp program, preferably in an area where there was already a heavy need for such a program, there could be no great objection to it, provided it was limited in its amount and would not be regarded as a general departure from the very large program which is already under way.

If I misunderstood the Senator from Vermont, I should like him to correct me.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator did not misunderstand me. The amendment which I would have offered would have authorized this only. However, I found that the Senator from Minnesota planned to offer this other amendment and so I did not offer any amendment myself.

Mr. HOLLAND. I understood that the Senator from Minnesota was offering this amendment in behalf of himself and the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. That is right.

Mr. HUMPHREY. And the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON].

Mr. HOLLAND. And the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. AIKEN. This will be in conference. Personally, I do not know whether it makes too much difference whether it is an authorization or a directive, because the House bill, in effect, contains a directive for a very broad, sweeping program which was adopted by the House, I believe, by a vote of 2 to 1.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Two to one.

Mr. HOLLAND. However, the House bill is permissive, in the first place; in the second place, the Senate has voted down a directive program. The Senators from Louisiana and Florida were trying to work out a program which would be in accord with the sentiment of the Senate as expressed, or at least not contrary thereto, and which would give us a chance to go into conference with an expression of the Senate that something in this field should be done.

Mr. AIKEN. I did not understand that the Senator from Florida was going to accept the proposal which I would have made had the Senator from Minnesota not offered his amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think I told the Senator I would not object to it. Later I conferred with the chairman of the committee and found that he was willing, as I was, to accept it if it were in a permissive form, and limited as the Senator indicated he proposed to limit it. I am still of that opinion. If we go into conference with an expression of the Senate differing from our expression the other day, it will indicate that we think something should be done in this field. In that case, I would be happy to accept the amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, this is an argument based upon a difference in point of view. The Senator from Florida has not been for the food stamp plan, by direction or by authorization, either in the committee or outside the committee. I feel that if we are to have a trial run we should not have it in less than three areas. We have limited the proposed program to a maximum of six areas. We have reduced the amount of funds for the use of surplus commodities to $15 million.

The plan would operate in areas where we are currently operating a food distribution program; but, as the Senator from Vermont has said, it is not a program in which Government officials are handing out Government packages from a Government warehouse, to people who are made to feel subservient. This program will be operated through normal channels. Witnesses before the committee said they would be delighted to try it. As a matter of fact, the commissioner of welfare came from Detroit to outline the entire program, and said that Detroit would be one area where they would like to make a trial run.

In conference we already have a broad authorization from the House. The authorization provides that the Secretary "shall"—not "may." If the chairman will give me the bill, I will read it.

Mr. ELLENDER. Read the preceding paragraph, and the Senator will see that the language is permissive.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I read from section 306(a), on page 7 of House bill 8609:

> In order to promote the general welfare, raise the levels of health and of nourishment for persons whose incomes prevent them from enjoying adequate diets * * * the Secretary of Agriculture * * * is hereby authorized to promulgate and put into operation as quickly as possible a program to distribute to needy persons in the United States through a food stamp system such surplus food commodities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY. My colleagues have been very generous in using my time. I ask for 5 minutes on the bill.

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield 5 minutes on the bill to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Reading further:

> (c) The Secretary shall issue, to each welfare department or equivalent agency of a State or political subdivision requesting the distribution of surplus food under subsection (b)(1), food stamps—

And so forth. The overriding force of that authorization is that the Secretary "shall" do these things. All we are asking for is a modest trial run. We are going to conference, and possibly we will end up with nothing but an authorization; but make no mistake about it, when the House, on a rollcall vote, votes two to one, we had better have something to offer as a counterproposal. We have been in conference with Members of the other body on previous occasions, and they have been able to stand their ground fairly well.

I think this proposal should be voted on. If the Senate wishes to say that with $9 billion worth of surplus food, we are not prepared to authorize a food stamp plan which has been talked about and worked upon, and with respect to which even the Department itself has made a study, if we are not prepared to authorize and direct the undertaking of at least three trial run projects, there is something wrong. I should like to see a vote on the proposal.

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. JORDAN. As the Senator knows, I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HUMPHREY. And a very fine member.

Mr. JORDAN. This subject was discussed at great length, and there was a wide division of opinion on the subject.

If the proposed plan were put into effect, would it not be over and above the present program?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JORDAN. We would continue to distribute the amount of food we are now distributing, and the proposed program would be in addition.

Mr. HUMPHREY. In the areas where the plan would be utilized to serve the people, we would not be serving them with other commodities than those in surplus supply.

Mr. JORDAN. The bill does not so provide.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Secretary would have full power. The Secretary would be authorized to promulgate whatever rules and regulations he might wish to promulgate. The only limitation is that these contributions may not be deducted from social security payments, and the plan could not be operated under the present distribution system, involving large containers of food.

Mr. JORDAN. My principal objection is that the Senator is saying that we must put in operation one of these plans whether it is needed or not.

Mr. HUMPHREY. No; that is not correct.

Mr. JORDAN. Under the terms of the bill, the Secretary must find at least three areas in which to operate the plan.

Mr. HUMPHREY. He would surely have no trouble, in the United States finding three areas in which to start the plan for the distribution of $15 million worth of food through the food-stamp system. This argument is like saying that if one looks at the sky in the evening he is likely to see stars. Certainly he is.

Everyone knows that there are vast areas in the country where these programs are needed. If we have a food distribution program to the tune of $200 million a year—and that is what the Senator from Florida just reported—let no one tell me that there are not places in America where the food-stamp trial-run program could be set in operation.

The bill provides a maximum. It does not require the expenditure of the entire $15 million a year. The food-stamp program is much more desirable than the handout food distribution program, which makes people "reliefers."

Mr. JORDAN. I still come back to the same objection to the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, this amendment would provide for, first, demonstration food-stamp programs in from three to six areas.

It requires the Secretary of Agriculture to formulate and administer demonstration food-stamp programs in not less than three nor more than six geographically dispersed areas, at least one of which shall be a rural area. To the extent practicable, they shall be surplus labor areas. These programs would terminate by January 1, 1962. Appropriation of $15 million is authorized to carry them out.

The Secretary of Agriculture is given very broad authority with respect to the types of food-stamp demonstration programs to be carried out. He would be expected to provide for use of the normal channels of trade to the maximum extent practicable in carrying out such programs. It is anticipated that stamps or coupons would be distributed or sold to eligible recipients to be used by them in the purchase of food or particular kinds of food at eligible food stores. Stores could in turn redeem the coupons through designated banks. The Secretary would be required to report to Congress on the operation of the demonstration programs as soon as practicable after their termination so that Congress would be prepared to provide for a large-scale program should such a program become necessary.

Section 303 of the amendment authorizes the Secretary to use surplus commodities in carrying out these demonstration programs as he sees fit.

Benefits under the food-stamp-allotment programs would not be considered income for the purposes of the Social Security Act or related legislation; and assistance under this legislation, as well as assistance from State and local governments, would not be a basis for denying eligibility for the benefits of the food-stamp-allotment programs.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Senators heard all of these arguments last Friday, and at that time, we rejected this proposal. This morning I had further occasion to discuss the subject with the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the distinguished senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND]. It was my understanding at that time that the proposal which would be submitted today would be a permissive one, and not a mandatory order to the Secretary of Agriculture. With all due respect, the Senator from Minnesota is in error when he states that the program adopted by the House is a mandatory one. It is permissive. Section 306 of the House bill makes that point very plain. It states:

> The Secretary of Agriculture * * * is hereby authorized to promulgate and put into operation as quickly as possible a program to distribute to needy persons in the United States through a food stamp system such surplus food commodities.

If the Secretary of Agriculture decides to promulgate such a program, he then "shall" do what the Senator from Minnesota states. But the authority in the House bill is permissive.

I wish to correct another statement made by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota. The cost of this program would not be limited to $15 million, as the Senator said. That figure represents only the actual dollars which the Congress would have to appropriate to carry out the demonstration food stamp program.

Section 303(c) of the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota provides as follows:

> The Secretary is authorized and directed in carrying out the provisions of this title to utilize such stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation (determined by the Secretary to be in surplus supply) as he shall deem fit.

In other words, in addition to the $15 million, the Secretary could, for all practical purposes, utilize unlimited amounts of surplus agricultural commodities on hand.

So let us not say that this is only a $15 million program. It is not. The cost may run as high as $100 million or $200 million. There is no limitation.

When I, as chairman of the committee, agreed to accept this amendment in view of the fact that the House had adopted a food stamp plan provision, I accepted it with the understanding that the program would be permissive.

If the Senator from Minnesota would modify his amendment so as to make the authority given the Secretary of Agriculture permissive——

Mr. HUMPHREY. Does the Senator from Louisiana think the Secretary of Agriculture will do anything at all if it is merely permissive?

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not know. To begin with I may say, as I said Friday, that this stamp program should not be attached to Public Law 480. The pending amendment is now on the calendar in bill form. I think this program should stand or fall on its own merits. The agriculture committee reported a similar food stamp program, as the Senator knows, several weeks ago. It strikes me that instead of trying to add this program to Public Law 480, the bill now on the calendar should be called up and acted upon. If the Senate desires to give a mandate to the Secretary of Agriculture, good and well. But, as I said before, the Senate turned down this identical proposal last Friday. In discussions which we have had today, this proposal was revived. I personally agreed to accept it, on the condition that it be made a permissive program since there is a food stamp program in the House bill, so we could work on it in conference. If the Senator will agree to a permissive program, I will urge no objection to his amendment. Of course, the proposal will have to be submitted to the Senate. However, I do not believe a program of this kind should be in the form of a directive to the Secretary of Agriculture. I call attention to the fact that millions of dollars of surplus agricultural commodities will be used for this program—and I admit this is a worthy cause in addition to the $15 million to carry out the program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield myself 2 more minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I did not seek a broad interpretation to be put on it, as the Senator from Louisiana does. I had proposed a limitation of $15 million as a trial run. If the Senator wants to make this a broader bill——

Mr. ELLENDER. No; I do not want to make it a broader bill. I am ready to act on the pending amendment.

Section 202 of Public Law 480 authorizes the President to use such surplus stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation to carry out administration programs as he sees fit. These commodities would be in addition to the $20 million authorized to be appropriated to carry out this program.

Mr. HUMPHREY. We have changed the language in the modified bill.

Mr. ELLENDER. But the Senator did not strike from the bill section 303(c), which provides for surplus food.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I read from the amendment:

> The Secretary is authorized and directed in carrying out the provisions of this title to utilize such stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation (and other commodities as determined by the Secretary to be in surplus supply) as he shall deem fit.

Section 306, in the amendment, provides:

> There is hereby authorized to be appropriated $15 million for carrying out the demonstration food stamp allotment programs.

If the Senator from Lousiana wants to change the amount to $20 million, I will vote for it, and it would still be a good demonstration project. I admit it is a pittance. In Public Law 480, we provide for oversea distribution of foods. We have just provided for $300 million each year for 3 years, under the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. I am for that. It is for famine relief and aid to the needy.

Under title I, in which provision is made for the use of soft currencies, where such currencies cannot be used anywhere else but in the countries of their origin, such as in Poland, food stamps could be used in Poland.

But I am being told today that a food stamp plan for the United States ought not to be adopted.

It is very true that a food stamp program is a better ordered program than mass distribution. It gives a person a sense of dignity. In order to get surplus food, he can walk into a grocery store where foods are listed as being surplus. He can buy like any other customer, and he will not have to go down the street to the relief office and ask for a handout. He can walk into a store and use food stamps just as he would use currency in order to buy food.

I think it is about time that Congress treated the American people as we treat others. I will be very much surprised if we do not.

[Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). The guests of the Senate who are in the galleries will remain in order.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 more minutes. As I stated a moment ago, this amendment was rejected last Friday. To hear the distinguished Senator from Minnesota talk now, one would assume that there is no program at all for the needy people of the United States. The Senator from Minnesota knows better than that.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] clearly pointed out Friday that there is a program for the needy of this country which involves the expenditure of more than $200 million per year.

But the proposal of the Senator from Minnesota is a brand new one which he seeks to have attached to Public Law 480. I say it has no place in Public Law 480. The food stamp plan should be called up and considered on its own merits. As I have said, a bill to provide such a food stamp plan is now on the calendar. It ought to be considered by itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 more minute. The House has adopted a food stamp program which is permissive. I am willing, as I said to the Senator from Minnesota and other Senators, to take such a proposal to conference.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 more minute, and I now yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. In order that the exact facts may be shown at this point in the RECORD, the report of the Department of Agriculture covering the program of distribution of surplus foods to the needy of the United States was filed as of September 3, 1959, and continues through June of this year. It shows that for fiscal 1959, which ended with June of this year, the total value of food products given to the needy——

Mr. ELLENDER. In the United States.

Mr. HOLLAND. In the United States—was $203.6 million; and that the total number of beneficiaries in the month of June was 4,715,349 persons.

Mr. HART. May we have similar figures for the people in foreign countries?

Mr. HOLLAND. The similar figure for the amount spent in foreign countries in fiscal 1959 is $209.8 million. The number of beneficiaries is not shown on the report, because the commodities are channeled for distribution through the governments of the foreign countries.

Mr. HART. The other figure is the best for comparison.

Mr. HOLLAND. The other figure is the best for comparison.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield myself 2 more minutes, and I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Furthermore, it would be a duplicate program; and certainly as a duplicate program it could not be used in any State in which the State authorities prefer to use the other program, and not to use this one.

I think the program should be permissive because, by all means, it will call for negotiations as to the areas in which it should be used, and whether it should properly be used in any particular area.

To make the execution of the program mandatory upon the Secretary, regardless of the programs which the States may have, regardless of what the cities may have, and regardless of what the trade may do—because, after all, this program is something which enters into the channels of trade; to provide that the Secretary must, mandatorily, find a place to spend $15 million in competition with other suppliers, regardless of the attitude of the public officials of the States and cities affected; that is a conclusion which I would not care to make. I do not propose to place upon the Secretary of Agriculture such a requirement. That is the reason why I do not favor a mandatory program.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, how much time have I remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. ELLENDER. I point out that under the program discussed by the distinguished Senator from Florida, 4,715,349 needy people, in all the States of the Union, have received and are receiving surplus food through existing channels.

Michigan has 380,343 persons benefiting from the program. Mississippi has 179,000; Arkansas, 178,000; Kentucky, 280,000; Louisiana, 120,000.

This program has been in operation for some time. The amendment before the Senate would merely add one more program on top of these now in existence.

I point out that if the program is enacted in the form of a directive to the Secretary of Agriculture, it will cost the $15 million in cash, plus the value of surplus commodities on hand.

I do not believe the Senate should adopt a program of that magnitude at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate on the amendment has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For what purpose does the Senator from Pennsylvania address the Chair?

Mr. CLARK. For the purpose of requesting that I be allowed to speak for 3 minutes on the bill, in order to speak further on the amendment. I seek that time from either the acting majority leader or the acting minority leader. In fact, I make the request myself; I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may proceed for 3 minutes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I shall gladly yield 2 minutes on the bill to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for 2 minutes on the bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether this amendment has been approved by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. Has not the amendment also been approved by the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. HUMPHREY. No; the amendment has been approved only by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CLARK. I ask my friends on this side of the aisle to consider how much attention they think the Secretary of Agriculture will pay to a permissive amendment. It seems to me that if we want this food stamp plan put into effect, we had better follow the recommendation of the Senator from Minnesota and direct the Secretary of Agriculture to put this food stamp program into effect.

I do not have a shadow of doubt in my mind that 6 cities in Pennsylvania will be glad to direct that the food stamp plan be put into effect there, even though in Pennsylvania we have a food distribution program going on. In fact, I have no doubt that not only 6 cities in America, but 66 or 666 cities in America will be glad to use food in that way, to sustain human life in areas where private enterprise does not have sufficient funds to pay for the needed food, and will be glad to put this food plan into effect.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will, by its action, sustain the action taken by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. HART. Let me remind the Senate that the committee was advised by W. E. Fitzgerald, executive secretary of the Food Industry Committee, of Detroit, that they had a program in writing, and would welcome an opportunity to participate.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to support its Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum; and I ask unanimous consent that the time required for the quorum call not be charged to the time on the bill available to either side.

Mr. HOLLAND. First, Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield 30 seconds to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me 30 seconds on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested; and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I withdraw my suggestion of the absence of a quorum; and at this time I yield to the Senator from Florida 30 seconds on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized for 30 seconds on the bill.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I merely wish to advise the Senator from Pennsylvania that a report by the Department of Agriculture, dated September 3, shows that in June of this year, his own State of Pennsylvania, which professedly has the greatest need for this program, had 735,000 citizens who were receiving surplus food. Under those circumstances, someone would have to exercise judgment as to whether duplicate programs, if established, could properly serve the need, under the conditions which obtain.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, let me say that I am well aware of the facts which my friend, the Senator from Florida, has called to my attention. I do not need to be shown that record in order to be aware of them.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on this question, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CARROLL subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, prior to the vote, an editorial entitled "Senate Should Take the Bold Road," from the Denver Post of August 27, 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE SHOULD TAKE THE BOLD ROAD

The Senate this week is expected to make its last effort of the current session at trying to further reduce surplus farm crops owned or stored by the Government's Commodity Credit Corporation.

The House has already passed and sent to the senior Chamber a 1-year extension of Public Law 480. Under this law CCC may dispose of some of the surplus at home or abroad in a number of ways at less than normal commercial crop prices.

An example of the kind of thing the House hopes for in the domestic field is a stamp plan to aid welfare cases short of food.

The Department of Agriculture is authorized, although not required, to dispose of up to $1 billion in surplus crops next year by issuing food stamps to persons recommended by welfare agencies.

Needy people anywhere in the country would use the stamps to buy designated surplus foods at regular groceries.

The Senate has a more modest stamp plan in mind, at least in the Agriculture Committee. This would use the stamps only in a few distressed areas, would provide only $20 million for the year's authorization, and would provide nonsurplus foods needed by the welfare cases for health reasons.

The Department of Agriculture hasn't wanted to bother with these stamp plans, both because they can't move too much of the huge surplus, and because they might interfere in some cases with regular commercial marketing.

As to foreign disposal, the Senate deliberations will be between the simple extension of Public Law 480 and the more comprehensive food for peace bill of Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY which has been approved by the Foreign Relations Committee.

The Humphrey bill would authorize a 3-year commitment of up to $2 billion a year in surplus crops. These could be given away where needed, sold on the basis of long-term loans, or sold with the resulting foreign currencies being plowed back into foreign aid projects in the food buying country.

Besides its long-range and more comprehensive nature, the Humphrey bill would also pull our foreign food operations together under one new office within the Department of Agriculture. They are now dispersed, and sometimes neglected, in a dozen odd crannies of government.

In both cases, it would be wise for the Senate to take the boldest route offered, by adopting the full Humphrey plan and the larger stamp program.

It is easy for detractors of these programs to object to details. The Department of Agriculture at the recent hearings has been particularly notable for saying it couldn't be done.

But the overall gravity of the surplus problem calls for the most creative, vigorous push the Senate can give our farm policy.

The possible mistakes, or disruption of comfortable administrative arrangements, are small risks compared to our great need to learn as much as we can as fast as we can about moving crop surpluses into more mouths and off taxpayers' backs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I understood that the absence of a quorum had been suggested.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That suggestion was withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll; and Mr. AIKEN answered in the affirmative.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will state it.

Mr. CARROLL. I was under the impression that the Senator from Louisiana had suggested the absence of a quorum, and then requested that the time required therefor——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair state that the vote is in progress, and the parliamentary inquiry is not in order.

The clerk will proceed with the call of the roll.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr.

KEFAUVER], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] are absent on official business.

So Mr. HUMPHREY's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill, it is proposed to add the following new section:

SEC. . In lieu of the limitation on annual payment rates for 1960 conservation reserve contracts prescribed in clause (2) of the sixth proviso under the head "Conservation Reserve" in Public Law 86-80, no such annual payment rate shall be established in excess of 20 percent of the value of the land placed under contract, such value to be determined without regard to physical improvements thereon or geographical location thereof; but in no event shall such annual payment rate be established in excess of the maximum rate which the county committee determines would have been established for such land under the 1959 conservation reserve program, except that the county committee in making such determination shall not be required to obtain the landowner's or operator's estimate as to value or his certificate as to production history and productivity.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, the amendment I have offered on behalf of myself, the distinguished Senator from Kansas [MR. SCHOEPPEL], the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [MR. YOUNG], and the distinguished Senator from Colorado [MR. ALLOTT], represents an emergency matter which is required because next week, or perhaps at the end of this week, the farmers will begin to sign up for 1960 crop year rental rates for conservation reserve acreage throughout the country. This next crop year is the final year in which the soil bank program is authorized to operate, by signing up compliance acres.

We have been operating according to a rental formula of payments which has worked out rather satisfactorily in the past, especially during the current crop year. Under the original act we gave the Secretary of Agriculture certain guidelines to follow in establishing payment rates, leaving a sufficient latitude within those guidelines for him to set rates which were fair and reasonable.

However, my amendment is now necessary, Mr. President, because a new limitation was written into the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill at the insistence of the House last year, which has proved to be unworkable, which is making it impossible to carry out the objectives of Congress.

The new limitation provides:

In establishing annual rental rates for new contracts, no such rental rate shall be established in excess of the local fair rental value of the acreage offered, such fair rental value to be based upon the average annual crop production harvested from such acreage during the past 5 crop years.

In application, Mr. President, this limitation has proved to be unworkable, because of average derived from total production divided by the 5 years. We run into situations in different States, or even within counties, where there have been crop failures, grasshopper plagues, droughts, or floods. In some instances this would mean that the farmer, in order to put his land into the conservation reserve, would have to accept less than 50 percent of what was the figure for the preceding year. That was never the intention of the committee at the time the limitation was written, but that is the way it has operated.

My amendment has the support of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a letter from the Acting Secretary, Marvin L. McLain, supporting the proposed legislation, together with a statement which I made before the Senate Committee on Appropriations in this connection.

There being no objection, the letter and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 28, 1959.

HON. CARL HAYDEN,
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations, U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR HAYDEN: This is in reply to the request of Senator MUNDT during the hearings before your committee, on August 26, 1959, for an example of how the "local fair rental value" limitation on conservation reserve payments in the Agricultural Appropriation Act will apply in the case of a landlord-tenant operated farm.

The "local fair rental value" limitation leaves the county committee no discretion except to take the production on the farm for the last 5 years and divide it by five to get the average annual production. In areas where cash rental rates are not available, the landlord's customary share of the production must be taken to establish the local rental value.

If we take as an example a farm on which the average return per acre for the last 5 years has been $40, in an area where the landlord's customary share of the crop is one-fourth, the rent would be established at $10 per acre. Even if we add $2 per acre to cover the cost of controlling weeds, repair of fences, maintaining cover, and other special obligations which the producer assumes under the conservation reserve contract, the maximum rate per acre which may be paid on the farm under the limitation, is $12 per acre. This $12 per acre does not all go to the owner, but must be shared by the owner with the tenant.

In areas where drought or other disaster conditions have prevented a normal crop in any 1 or more of the 5 years, the rate of payment will be even lower.

Under this limitation, the 1960 rates are considerably less than the rates in effect for 1959, and it is obvious that such rates are not sufficient to attract participation by landlord-tenant operated farms.

Under the amendment proposed by Senators MUNDT, YOUNG, and SCHOEPPEL, the rates for 1960 would be comparable to the rates in 1959.

Sincerely yours,

MARVIN L. MCLAIN,
Acting Secretary.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MUNDT BEFORE SENATE APPROPRIATION COMMITTEE

Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit an amendment, to be inserted at the proper place in the bill, having to do with the soil bank. This amendment is necessary to make the program workable.

At the insistence of the other branch of the Congress, a new limitation was written into the Agricultural Appropriation Act this year providing a new formula for determining the rate of annual payments for land put in the conservation reserve.

Under the original Soil Bank Act, we gave the Secretary of Agriculture certain guidelines to follow in establishing payment rates and left him sufficient latitude within those guidelines to set rates which were fair and reasonable. We said there that "The rate or rates of the annual payment to be provided for in the contracts shall be established on such basis as the Secretary determines will provide producers with a fair and reasonable annual return on the land * * * taking into consideration the value of the land for the production of commodities customarily grown on such kind of land in the county or area, the prevailing rates for cash rentals for similar land in the county or area, the incentive necessary to obtain contracts covering sufficient acreage for the substantial accomplishment of the purposes of the Conservation Reserve Program, and such other factors as he deems appropriate."

You will notice that we stated that the aim should be to provide producers with a "fair and reasonable" return on their land. Under another provision in the Soil Bank Act, we directed the Secretary to provide adequate safeguards to protect the interests of tenants and sharecroppers including provision for sharing on a fair and equitable basis in the payments.

The new limitation on payments which was written into the Agricultural Appropriation Act this year has proved to be unworkable and makes it impossible to carry out those objectives.

The new limitation contained in the Appropriation Act provides that "in establishing annual rental rates for new contracts, no such rental rate shall be established in excess of the local fair rental value of the acreage offered, such fair rental value to be based upon the average annual crop production harvested from such acreage during the past 5 crop years."

Under this new limitation, county committees are left with no discretion in determining the rates of payment other than to take the farmer's production for the last 5 years, divide it by five to get the average annual production, and then take a landlord's fourth of that to determine the rental value. A small amount may be added to reimburse the farmer for the special obligations which he assumes under the conservation reserve contract such as the cost of controlling weeds, building fences, and maintaining the cover.

If we take as an example land which has an average gross return of $40 per acre, a landlord's one-fourth or whatever it might be of that. If we add $2 to cover the cost of weed control, mowing the cover, building fences, etc., the maximum annual payment which could be paid would be $12 per acre.

The owner will not even receive all of this $12 since it must be divided between him and his tenant. What owner, who can rent his land to a private individual for $10, is going to put his land in the Conservation Reserve for $12 and have to share the $12 with a tenant?

In some States, such as my own, where there have been 1 or more dry years during the last 5 years, the amount of the annual payment in many cases will be ridiculously low.

What this means is that some States will virtually be excluded from participation in the program. And in nearly all States, the 1960 rate will be much below the rates being paid under current contracts.

The amendment which I propose would substitute for the limitation in the original Appropriation Act, the provision that no annual payment shall be established in excess of 20 percent of the value of the land placed under contract but in no event shall such payment rate be established in excess of the 1959 rate.

This will give the local county committees sufficient discretion to set rates which are fair and reasonable and at the same time will afford adequate safeguards against the rates being too high.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I am happy to yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the Senator yield me 3 minutes?

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I am about to yield to the Senator from North Dakota, but before I do so I wish to state that we appeared before the Committee on Appropriations, because originally we thought this provision could be added to the supplemental appropriation bill, if one came along, or to the mutual security appropriation bill. Because of the urgency of the matter, since it is necessary that the State and county committeemen know the rules, we are offering this proposal at this time, since it seems to be the first place it can be done realistically, to get the guidelines out to our farmers and their committeemen so signups can proceed effectively for the crop year of 1960.

Mr. President, I am happy to yield 3 minutes to the Senator from North Dakota, reserving the balance of my time for later discourse.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, I am happy to support the amendment.

The purpose of the amendment is to correct the effects of a rider which was placed on an appropriation bill for the Agriculture Department, without hearing. The intent of the rider was well meant, well intentioned; it would have based the payments on rental values, rather than on the land production history of all the farms. That procedure will work all right in certain areas of the United States, but in probably over two-thirds of the United States the payments would be very unfair, particularly as between the renter and the landlord. If there were no renter at all, the payments would not be too bad in certain instances.

In no event under the amendment we are offering could the payments be higher than those of last year. In fact, Mr. President, because there is only about half as much money available for the program in 1960 as was available for the program in 1959, there will be a sharp bidding among the farmers to put their land under the program. As a result, the payments will be far less per farm in 1960 than they will be this year.

If the present law is not changed, there will be a grave injustice done to farmers in many areas of the United States. North Dakota is one of those areas.

The Department of Agriculture has recognized that the provisions of the rider which was written into the previous appropriation bill are unfair and unworkable. The Department of Agriculture is supporting the amendment.

Mr. President, we face an urgent situation. We have the "signup" all over the Nation for the soil bank program for next year on September 10. Unless Congress takes action immediately, there will be a very unfair situation and an unworkable situation throughout practically all the United States.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], a cosponsor of the amendment.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I join with my colleagues, as indicated, in support of the amendment. As pointed out, an emergency situation confronts the areas which will be affected by the measure due to the fact that we are up against a deadline. It has been freely admitted that the rider placed on the appropriation bill heretofore places an entirely different criteria on the payment than was intended by the Congress. This is the only opportunity we shall have before the deadline to get corrective legislation, to eliminate a lot of inequities among the landlords and the tenants as well.

There is one other thing which we who sponsored this amendment believe should be taken into consideration. That is, no consideration was given to the criteria that would have to be followed in carrying out the rider in the appropriation measure, which was heretofore placed on the measure in the event of crop failures.

Various sections in the United States have had one or two crop failures in a period of 5 years. It would absolutely be an inequitable situation, and this type of amendment, we believe, equitably and fairly eliminates inequities which would result.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I am happy to yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I feel very strongly about this amendment. I know that in many conversations, as well as communications from my own area of the country, I have found that the present provisions of the law result in very great injustices and inequities.

Under the present 5-year average of the present law, this would result in my own State, and, in fact, in most of the Great Plains area, in rentals of $2 to perhaps $3 being paid under the conservation reserve. Of course, that means that the people in that area could not avail themselves of the conservation reserve in any respect.

It seems to me that this inequity should be corrected, and should be corrected now, because this is probably the only opportunity we will have to correct it. For that reason I have joined my colleagues in the submission of the amendment. I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I have discussed this amendment with the distinguished chairman of our Agriculture Committee, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], and I believe he is willing to accept it. In the event there is no further discussion, I am willing to yield back the remainder of my time.

In short, what the amendment does is to provide that in the last year in which the soil bank is authorized to operate, the rental payments and allocations will be commensurate and related to those which obtained for 1959, and that the language which has caused so much concern throughout the country will be set aside insofar as it was not in accord with the appropriations bill of last year.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

As the distinguished Senator from South Dakota has stated, hearings were held a few years ago in an attempt to pinpoint the evils about which he complains. It is by belief that there is a great deal of merit in the proposal he is making, but it is also my judgment than an amendment of this kind should not be attached to legislation extending Public Law 480, but since this bill has already had the food stamp plan and other provisions added to it, I urge no objection to the amendment.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MUNDT. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. ELLENDER. I ask unanimous consent that a further explanation of the amendment prepared by the staff of the Agriculture Committee be placed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In essence, this amendment reinstates the limitation on annual rental payments under the conservation reserve program which was in effect in 1959 under the 1959 Appropriation Act, and supersedes the limitation prescribed by Public Law 86-80, the 1960 Appropriation Act.

The limitation which was prescribed by the 1959 Appropriation Act was 20 percent of the value of the land placed under contract.

The limitation prescribed by the 1960 Appropriation Act for new contracts entered into in 1960 is the local fair rental value of the land placed under the contract, determined upon the basis of the average annual crop production during the past 5 crop years. A number of problems have arisen with respect to the limitation prescribed by the 1960 Appropriation Act. Since the law provides for sharing by the landlord and tenant of the payment, the 1960 Appropriation Act limitation would require that the landlord receive less than the fair rental value as his share of the payment. Further, since the purpose of the program is to take land out of production, it requires something more than the fair rental value to accomplish this purpose. Still further, the 5-year production basis causes problems where the land is summer fallowed in some years or has been subject to drought for some period of the 5 years.

The amendment is designed to correct these difficulties by returning to the limitation prescribed in 1959. The amendment, however, does also provide, as an additional safeguard, that the annual payment rate shall not be in excess of that which would have been established under the 1959 program. Due to the lateness of the change in the limitation which would be made by the amendment, the amendment excuses landowners and operators from estimating the value of the land or certifying as to production history or productivity.

It may be that the amendment would accomplish a good purpose, but it has no relation to the pending measure and has not been studied by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the proper place in the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

( ) Title III of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section as follows:

"SEC. 306. Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture determines under section 106 of this Act that any food commodity is a surplus agricultural commodity, he shall make such commodity available for distribution to needy families and persons in the United States in such quantities as he determines are reasonably necessary before such commodity is made available for sale for foreign currencies under title I of this Act."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment for myself and my colleagues, Senators MORTON, DOUGLAS, LANGER, YOUNG of North Dakota, HENNINGS, KEATING, CLARK, SCOTT, BUSH, RANDOLPH, BYRD of West Virginia, YARBOROUGH, FONG, and JAVITS.

I have distributed copies of the amendment, and I hope that Senators will read the amendment.

Mr. President, I can explain the purpose of the amendment very briefly. Its purpose is to assure that needy persons in the United States who are designated by State agencies eligible to receive surplus agricultural food shall have the opportunity to receive what is reasonably necessary for their needs, before surplus agricultural foods are sold abroad for foreign currencies.

Let me make it clear at the outset that my amendment does not establish any new relief agencies. It does not upset the present Federal Government-State-local community relationship. It does not add to the number of recipients of surplus foods unless the States take action at the local level to enlarge the number of our people eligible to receive food. It does not interfere with dollar sales at home or abroad.

The amendment does provide that in the event the Secretary of Agriculture determines that there is a sufficient supply of surplus foods to permit their sale abroad for foreign currency, that before he makes such sales or authorizes such sales to be made abroad, he shall first make the surplus food available to the needy people and needy families of the United States. My amendment will assure that we do justice to the needy people of our own country, that we supply them needed food before we send it to other peoples throughout the world. We can satisfy the needs of our people, and still there will be plenty left, supplies running over, to send to other peoples.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I heartily endorse the Senator's amendment. As he knows, I took a somewhat similar position in principle earlier this year to get food to needy families in the District, to feed about 7,000 little boys and girls who do not even get one meal a day. I would consider it a great honor if the Senator from Kentucky would include my name as one of the cosponsors.

Mr. COOPER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Oregon be added as a cosponsor to the amendment. He has been a great fighter for the school lunch program. This amendment will help the school-lunch program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the amendment which the Senator from Kentucky presents is similar to an amendment he called to our attention in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It is somewhat similar to the amendment which the senior Senator from Minnesota had attached to the Mutual Security Act. I believe it spells out with a little more definiteness and detail the objectives the Senator has so justly sought. What he seeks to do is the very essence of social justice in our country. He seeks to have surplus commodities used on a basis of equality for home consumption for our own needy as for recipients of commodities abroad. In other words, what the Senator from Kentucky is asking is that we apply the old adage that charity begins at home. In that spirit he has performed a great service.

I support his amendment, as I indicated to him earlier, and I, too, should like to be associated with him as a cosponsor of the proposal.

Mr. COOPER. I thank the Senator from Minnesota. I should like very much for him to be joined in the amendment. He has worked hard on this problem for months to assure an adequate supply of food for the needy of the United States.

Mr. KUCHEL. Will the Senator yield so that I may speak on an extraneous matter?

Mr. COOPER. I shall take a few more minutes, and then I shall yield. I should like to finish explaining the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. May I just take a minute? This is not an academic matter to me. It arises from experience last September, when I went into the eastern part of my State when Congress adjourned. I found that thousands of people—unemployed miners, their children, older people—were receiving surplus food. They were receiving shipments, at irregular intervals, powdered milk, rice, cornmeal, flour, and sometimes cheese. I talked to the officials of Harlan County and other counties, and immediately asked the Department of Agriculture for help. I said, "Can you send more regular shipments, and will you provide a better variety of food for the needy people of Kentucky and other States?" The Department of Agriculture did send more regular shipments. But the Department did nothing about providing a better variety of food. The Department contended that under the provisions of section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949, section 106 of Public Law 480, and other provisions of law, priorities had been established which placed the needy people of this country behind the people of foreign countries, if food commodities were sold or could be sold for foreign currencies.

For a year now I have been trying to get beans, cooking oils, and fruits and fresh and canned meats, when available. I found that even though they were in supply, they were being held, because it was possible that a sale for foreign currencies, might be made.

I shall not take further the time of the Senate. I have an analysis which shows that at the very time people in the United States needed beans and cooking oil and other available products, the Department of Agriculture would not send them to the needy of this country, because they thought it possible to make a sale for foreign currency. In all fairness, I repeat that the Secretary contended, and I assume with sincerity, he was following the law. My amendment will direct him to take care first of our needy—and, as I have said, there will be plenty left for other people in the world, and I am glad that we can help them. It will have no effect on wheat, corn, rice, dried milk, and other surplus foods, for they are in tremendous supply. The amendment will provide a better variety of filling foods, beans, cooking oil for gravy, fruit, and meats when available.

I have outlined the purposes of my amendment. Today in this country—although our economy is booming, and most people in this Nation have more to eat than ever before—thousands of people are still out of work through no fault of their own and need food. This amendment would give them the same privilege we give to the people of other countries.

I would like to add that my colleague, Senator MORTON, is very interested in the amendment of which he is a cosponsor, and is supporting it fully. Also those among others, Senators BYRD and RANDOLPH, of West Virginia, representing coal-producing States, also cosponsors, have made tremendous efforts to secure more food for their peoples, as have Senators CLARK and SCOTT, of Pennsylvania. And I want to pay a special tribute and say to cosponsor Senator DOUGLAS, of Illinois, with whom I joined as a cosponsor of the depressed areas bill, and who has fought for 2 years for the people of our depressed areas.

RETURN OF THE PRESIDENT

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, the President of the United States is scheduled to return to Washington in just 20 minutes. No doubt almost all Members of the Senate would be on hand to greet him at 2 o'clock at the airport were it not for the fact that we are engaged in transacting the public business.

However, I think the record should be made crystal clear that it is only for the reason that we are required to be in session devoting ourselves to highly important legislation, that we are prevented from saluting, in a body, an American Chief Executive, as our able friend from Wisconsin previously said, on a return from a thrilling, moving, and constructive sojourn abroad.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from California, and to join in the expression of good wishes and commendation for the President.

He has undertaken a very arduous tour. He has met with the leaders of the great North Atlantic Treaty alliance. I truly believe that this visit by the President to the chiefs of state of certain nations, particularly Germany, Great Britain, and France, has been a very constructive and helpful enterprise.

I am sure it is gratifying to every one of us that the President returns to us in good health and strength, and safely. As a member of the so-called opposition party, I wish to join the acting minority leader in saying that nothing would be more pleasing to me than to be able to be at the National Airport to greet the Chief Executive as he returns to the United States of America, to his work and the call of duty.

Mr. COOPER. I too, would like to associate myself with my colleagues, in their words of appreciation, felicitations, and pride over the leadership, in the quest for peace with honor, of the President of the United States.

EXTENSION OF AGRICULTURAL TRADE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1954

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1748) to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, as one of the principal cosponsors of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] I urge its adoption on my colleagues.

Senators will note that there is almost an equal number of sponsors on both sides of the aisle for the amendment of my good friend, the Senator from Kentucky.

My friend, the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], has asked unanimous consent that his name may be added as a cosponsor of this amendment. Is that satisfactory to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. COOPER. I am very happy to have him as an additional cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. We in Pennsylvania probably have a greater need for distribution of food products to needy persons than any other State in the Union. With the assistance of my junior colleague on the other side of the aisle [Mr. SCOTT], we have been endeavoring to the best of our ability to pry some food loose from the Department of Agriculture for those people. We have been signally unsuccessful in getting any additional products made available. The reason given by the Department representatives was that Public Law 480 sales of surplus food abroad have priority over all other domestic and foreign distribution.

Under the head of domestic and foreign distribution there are three priorities: First, the school-lunch program; second, institutional programs; third, the program for the needy.

The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, of which I am happy to be a cosponsor, would change the order of priority. It would give food for the needy of the United States first priority. This seems to me to be just, right, and fair. I have been one of those who have supported foreign aid. I would support it again. But I see no need for taking food out of the mouths of hungry Americans in order to sell it abroad, for currencies of dubious value.

I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am happy to be a cosponsor of the amendment of my distinguished friend from Kentucky.

It seems to me that when we are supplying machinery, equipment, technical advice, military assistance, and many other things, including food under Public Law 480 to assist other countries, we certainly should use some of it to take care of our own people in this country. There is something very wrong, it seems to me, if we are not as willing to aid our needy as we are to aid needy people in other parts of the world.

Surely we cannot close our eyes to the suffering of many thousands of Americans in this country.

The funds involved here merely represent money being paid by the Government to the Government, in that the funds are drawn from the Treasury to the account of the Department of Agriculture or an appropriate agency in it. Not only would any additional moneys spent under this amendment be paid to the Government, but there is also important saving, in that if we get rid of the surplus food in storage, we save storage costs on our huge stock of agricultural surpluses.

Therefore, with enthusiasm I shall support the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky. I commend him for the leadership he has taken in bringing this subject to our attention at this time.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New York for his steady support of this amendment now, and all during the year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. COOPER. In closing, I point out again that the amendment I offer would not establish any new relief system. It would not upset the State-Federal relationship with respect to the distribution of surplus food or the designation of recipients. In my judgment it would not cost any more money than the program now operated. I think it would actually save money, because the transfer of food to foreign countries requires expensive ocean freight charges.

Only a relatively small amount of food is involved. Let me give one example. Early this year we were trying to get cooking oil and beans. We could get neither oil nor beans. Yet, during the 6-month period from January 1, 1959, to June 30, 1959, a total of $2 million in dried edible beans was sent abroad, with no distribution to needy people in this country. During the past fiscal year, fiscal year 1959, a total of $4.1 million in dried edible beans was sent abroad, but none was supplied to the domestic food distribution program.

During the fiscal years 1955 through 1959, a total of $509.3 million in cooking oil was sent abroad, while domestic distribution to the needy people of this country during the same period amounted to only $14.4 million.

I close by repeating that it is a matter of justice that we treat the needy of this country as well as we do those of other countries. And I make that statement as one of those who have always supported our foreign aid program. I ask the Senate to adopt the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield back the remainder of his time?

Mr. COOPER. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes. I would like to point out that the Secretary of Agriculture already has the authority to do what this amendment provides. The only difference is that under section 32, which provides for funds, and under section 416 of the act of 1949, the Secretary is permitted to use quantities of our surplus commodities as he determines are reasonably necessary to assist our own people before any of the surpluses are sold under title I.

The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky makes it obligatory on the Secretary to do that which is now permissive. It is my judgment that in every case, whether it be permissive or obligatory, it still is left to the Secretary to set aside such quantities of surplus agricultural commodities as he determines are necessary to take care of our own needy people before any surplus commodities are sold abroad.

I shall be glad to take the amendment to conference.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield for 1 minute?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator from Louisiana has agreed to take the amendment to conference, so I do not want to be like the lawyer who asks an additional question after the judge has ruled in his favor, and then loses the case. But a minute ago the Senator made a statement which was—as I understood him—that the Secretary has authority now to do what my amendment proposes. The Senator knows the tremendous confidence I have in him. However, the Secretary has told me that he does not have such authority. For 1 year I have asked the Department of Agriculture to send beans, cooking oil, fruit, and any other commodities available to the people of my State and other States. But he has told me that he did not have such authority if the commodities could be sold abroad for foreign currencies.

Mr. ELLENDER. The reason for that may have been that such commodities were sold for dollars and not for soft currencies.

Mr. COOPER. My amendment would not apply if the commodities could be sold for dollars.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER. I am informed that the Department of Agriculture held beans, cooking oil, and other commodities in storage in the expectation that they could be sold for foreign currency.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am advised by the counsel of the Agriculture Committee that what the Senator from Kentucky seeks to do can now be done. The only difference is that his amendment makes it obligatory. I am willing to let it go at that. Of course, even though it is made obligatory, the Secretary under this amendment could dispose of, or would be almost forced to dispose of, surpluses for dollars before he made them available to the people of this country. It is only in the event that the commodities are sold for soft currencies that the proposal is made obligatory.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I express my deep appreciation to the Senator from Louisiana for his willingness to take the amendment to conference. What the representatives of the Department of Agriculture told the Senator from Kentucky was the same as they told me, namely, that the order of priority administratively, at present, is: First, sale abroad for dollars; second, sale abroad for foreign currencies; third, the school lunch program; fourth, distribution to institutions; and fifth, the needy persons programs. That is why I am so glad the Senator from Louisiana is willing to take the amendment to conference. I commend him for his action.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I call up my amendment which is at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Section 347 (b) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting a colon and the following: "Provided, however, That the national marketing quota for the 1960 crop of such cotton shall be not less than 90 per centum of the 1959 marketing quota for such cotton."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes. The amendment relates only to the extra long staple cotton, or premium grade cotton. While it is true that the Senator from Louisiana said he preferred not to include the amendment in the bill, but to try to restrict the bill to the items germane to it, nevertheless, the inclusion of the food stamp plan has violated the rule of germaneness. Therefore, I asked the able Senator from Louisiana if I might present my amendment in opposition to his desire not to do so. The amendment provides that for the year 1960 only, the marketing quota for extra long staple cotton shall not be less than 90 percent of the current marketing quota. I hope the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say that in face of the fact that there has been a departure from an agreed program with respect to another item in the bill, the Senator from New Mexico is now offering this proposal?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Which is the item on which there has been an abandonment of the agreed upon program?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not say there was an agreement; I simply say that the food stamp plan is covered by another bill, which I understand the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has reported. Yet, instead of waiting for the other bill to reach the floor, the Senate in its wisdom decided to adopt the food stamp plan and place it in this bill.

Mr. ELLENDER. I may state to the Senator from Ohio that the food stamp plan proposal which was adopted over my protest is identical with a bill on the calendar of the Senate today. I do not believe the pending measure is the place for the food stamp plan. That was why I objected to it.

The proposal which the distinguished Senator from New Mexico is offering has been adopted by the House and is in the House bill.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That does not answer my question. The statement has been made that there was an agreed course of action.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I wish to correct that impression. There was no understanding by any Senators except the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Arizona and myself. We agreed to withhold this amendment because of the desire of the Senator from Louisiana to keep only germane items in the bill. But there has been a departure from that wish by the adoption of the food stamp plan amendment. So the agreement between the Senator from Louisiana and myself has been abandoned.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I heard the Senator from Louisiana a moment ago engage in a discussion in which he said that there was an understanding that the trial of the food stamp plan was to be made permissive. But then it was finally changed and made mandatory. That was contrary to what he understood was to be the plan.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. There was a departure from that agreed course of conduct. Is that correct?

Mr. ELLENDER. There was a misunderstanding or a disagreement about what the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] had agreed to and what was proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. The Senator from Vermont had agreed to offer an amendment making the food stamp plan permissive. He so stated to the distinguished Senator from Florida. But instead of the amendment being offered by the Senator from Vermont, it was offered by the Senator from Minnesota, and in that amendment the plan was made obligatory. Of course, that is why I objected to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield myself 2 more minutes. I objected to the amendment and spoke against it. But the opponents of the amendment lost.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Are we now beginning to pass bills because we are becoming physically exhausted? Are we beginning to yield on amendments because we no longer have the energy to stand up and learn about them and do what we think is right? The Senator need not reply.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, the amendment does not involve that kind of situation. It was originally to have been handled as a separate item, but this is an expeditious way to handle it. I appreciate the attitude of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield back the rest of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield? I understand his amendment relates to the shipping portion of the bill. I think we have about finished with the consideration of the substantive amendments. However, I have one which I should like to offer. I do not think there will be too much controversy about it. So will the Senator from Maryland yield for the consideration of my amendment?

Mr. BUTLER. I am happy to yield. I will withhold the offering of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I call up my amendment identified as "9–1–59—D."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask that the printed amendment be modified, in line 4, on page 1, by striking out the word "directed" and inserting, in lieu thereof, the word "authorized."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be modified accordingly, and will be stated.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment, as modified, be printed at this point in the RECORD, without being read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the modified amendment submitted by Mr. HUMPHREY was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

( ) Title III is further amended by adding at the end thereof a new section as follows:

"SEC. 306. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Commodity Credit Corporation is hereby authorized—

"(1) to dispose of its stocks of animal fats and edible oils or products thereof by donation, upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture deems appropriate, to nonprofit voluntary agencies registered with the Department of State, appropriate agencies of the Federal Government or international organizations, for use in the assistance of needy persons outside the United States;

"(2) to purchase for donation as provided above such quantities of animal fats and edible oils and the products thereof as the Secretary determines will maintain the support level for cottonseed and soybeans without requiring the acquisition of such commodities under the price support program.

Commodity Credit Corporation may incur such additional costs with respect to commodities to be donated hereunder as it is authorized to incur with respect to food commodities disposed of under section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949, and may pay ocean freight charges from United States ports to designated ports of entry abroad."

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the amendment authorizes the Commodity Credit Corporation, under such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem to be appropriate, to make available its stocks of animal fats and edible oils and products thereof, for donation by voluntary, nonprofit agencies registered with the State Department, and international organizations, for use in the assistance of needy persons outside the United States.

Mr. President, we need legislation of this sort, particularly in view of the potential influx of substantial quantities of lard, due to excess production of pork.

The amendment also relates to oils which are the products of cottonseed, soybeans, and linseed. It merely authorizes the Secretary to utilize these commodities and their products for the purposes of donation for relief feeding.

I think the amendment will have a very salutary effect, in light of what the market conditions might be.

Mr. President, I have a statement in regard to the amendment, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HUMPHREY

Section 306: This new section specifies that the Commodity Credit Corporation should dispose of its stocks of animal fats and edible oils or products thereof by donation to the appropriate agencies of the Federal Government, nonprofit voluntary organizations registered with the Department of State, and international organizations for use in the assistance of needy persons outside the United States. The Commodity Credit Corporation is also authorized to purchase for donations animal fats, edible oils, and products thereof to maintain the support level for cottonseed and soybeans. The executive branch already has this authority, but this section makes it specific, in order to urge the executive branch to comply with the request of the Congress in this matter. Animal fats and edible oils have been needed and requested by voluntary organizations, but have been denied by the Government.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Of course.

Mr. ELLENDER. I understand that the amendment, as originally drafted, directed the Secretary to do these things, but that the modified amendment is permissive.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is correct; the language of the amendment, as modified, is permissive.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, with that understanding, I agree to take the amendment to conference.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have included in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a summary of the amendment.

There being no objection, the following explanation was ordered printed in the RECORD:

FATS AND OILS DONATIONS

This provision would authorize the Commodity Credit Corporation (1) to donate its stocks of animal fats and edible oils or products thereof for the assistance of needy persons outside the United States, and (2) to purchase such quantities of such commodities for such donation as will maintain the support level for cottonseed and soybeans.

Authority for the donation of such commodities already exists under section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 and other provisions of law upon the same conditions applicable to other commodities. Authority to acquire such commodities also exists. There appears to be no reason why fats and oils should be treated differently than other commodities. In its report on S. 1711, the Department of Agriculture advises that "Current market situations indicate the strong possibility that all surplus edible vegetable oils in the United States may be needed to meet demands of dollar sales or title I agreements. The continued low production of coconut oil, the flood disasters in the Argentine area, and the failure of Communist China to deliver in accordance with earlier indications may develop a tightness in the world market for edible oils which will be more than enough to absorb the indicated surplus in the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the modified amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the following bills and joint resolution of the Senate:

S. 825. An act to revise eligibility requirements for burial in national cemeteries, and for other purposes;

S. 1164. An act to authorize the appointment of a commissioner for Grand Canyon National Park, Ariz.;

S. 1973. An act to extend the validity of the passport to 3 years;

S. 2390. An act to authorize the exchange of certain lands in or in the vicinity of Everglades City, Fla., in furtherance of the administration and use of the Everglades National Park; and

S.J. Res. 25. Joint resolution to change the name of Roosevelt Dam, Reservoir, and Power Plant in Arizona to Theodore Roosevelt Dam, Lake and Power Plant.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the following concurrent resolutions of the Senate:

S. Con. Res. 53. Concurrent resolution to print additional copies of hearings on "Fallout From Nuclear Weapons Testing"; and

S. Con. Res. 72. Concurrent resolution to print additional copies of hearings on "Biological and Environmental Effects of Nuclear War."

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 2181) to amend the Mineral Leasing Act of February 25, 1920, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. ASPINALL, Mr. ROGERS of Texas, Mr. MORRIS of New Mexico, Mr. SAYLOR, and Mr. WHARTON were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

EXTENSION OF AGRICULTURAL TRADE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1954

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1748) to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is necessarily absent. Therefore, at this time I call up his amendment which is designated as "8–29–59–A," and offer the amendment for him, on behalf of himself, myself, the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], and my colleague from Maryland [Mr. BEALL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the bill, it is proposed to add the following new section:

At the end of the bill add a new section as follows:

SEC. II. The Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 is further amended by adding at the end of title III a new section as follows:

"SEC. 306. Shipments of surplus agricultural commodities destined to foreign countries, exported under titles I, II, or III of this Act, shall be delivered directly to the export vessel at a United States port. For the purpose of this section 'export vessel' shall mean the ocean vessel transporting the surplus agricultural commodities from the United States port of loading to foreign port of discharge."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, on the question of agreeing to this amendment, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, as I have stated, this amendment is the amendment of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]; and I have joined him in offering it, as have my colleague from Maryland [Mr. BEALL], the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is quite obvious. It would require that any agricultural products shipped to a foreign country under titles I, II, or III of the act, be directly loaded at an American port for export.

Mr. President, when the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 was enacted, it was declared to be the policy of Congress to promote the economic stability of American agriculture and the national welfare. Title I of the act authorized the President to negotiate agreements with friendly nations for the sale of surplus agricultural commodities for foreign currencies.

Now that we have been called upon to extend the authority of the 1954 act, we would do well to carefully examine, in the light of the national welfare, the promotion of which Congress has declared to be its policy, a recent action of the Department of Agriculture. I refer, Mr. President, to the decision to provide U.S. inspection and grade certification of title I grains at Canadian ports on the St. Lawrence River.

Grains moving under oversea trade contracts have heretofore required certificates of grade issued pursuant to the provisions of the U.S. Grain Standards Act. This has been, and continues to be, an altogether wise and just requirement, whereby the quality of the American export is guaranteed to the foreign countries participating in the trade contracts. It has also been heretofore required, with equal wisdom and justice, that the inspection which results in the issuance of grade certificates be carried on exclusively at points of departure in the United States. It is this second requirement which the Department of Agriculture, without legal or moral justification, and without regard for consequence, has discarded by its recent ruling; and it is the purpose of the present amendment not only to restore the agency requirement, but also to make it a permanent addition to the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act.

In joining in the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, I would not have it thought that I am opposed to the principle of selling surplus agricultural commodities for foreign currencies. In my judgment, both the principle and the methods which have been devised for carrying the principle into effect are of indisputable value. They not only permit the disposal of the expensive and unmanageable surpluses held in stock by the Commodity Credit Corporation, but they also increase the consumption of American produce abroad and make available funds to finance needed activities and services in foreign countries. Rarely have domestic and foreign policies been advanced so generously by a single law.

Nor would I want it thought that I am opposed to adequate and improved inspection of American grain exports, for we have an undoubted responsibility to warrant the quality of our merchandise. What I am opposed to, Mr. President, is the careless disruption of many segments of the American economy which will inevitably and immediately take place now that the Department's new inspection regulation has become effective as of September 1.

In the first place, the inspection and certification of title I and other export program grains at Canadian ports are of questionable legality. What procedures have been established for procuring Federal appeal grade certificates, the extra quality assurance which is available at U.S. ports? What jurisdictional arrangements have been made in the event the U.S. Grain Standards Act, in large part a criminal statute, is violated in Canada? These are legal points upon which I do not intend to dwell, because so much more of importance is at stake. The fact that the Department of Agriculture has failed to express itself on these points, however, is a good indication of the dubious and uncertain legal foundation of its decision.

Now, Mr. President, let us proceed to the true crux of the problem. What has the Department of Agriculture accomplished by its arbitrary decree? In simplest terms, it has assured that the grains contractually committed to foreign countries under trade agreements be moved from the midwestern grain centers for shipment out of the nearest available outlets. It mattered not one iota that the nearest outlets happened to be Canadian. And when the Department awakened to the realization that export grains could be inspected only at American outlets, it simply waved its administrative wand and made the requirement disappear. In just such a casual manner as this, after only one public hearing, at which bitter opposition was expressed by Atlantic and gulf port representatives and by the National Grain Trade Council, the Department of Agriculture effectively rerouted the course of millions of bushels of grain every year. This diversion will leave in its wake economic devastation of gigantic dimensions. All along the Atlantic and gulf coasts it will cause a tremendous annual loss in wages and taxes and transportation earnings. It will idle facilities which were created and manpower which was employed in anticipation of continuing shipments of surplus agricultural commodities. And all this economic distress will have been generated to satisfy the whims of a supposedly impartial agency of the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I must congratulate the Department of Agriculture on the ingenuity it has displayed in improving on that legendary financial transaction in which Peter is robbed to pay Paul. In this instance, the deepwater Atlantic and gulf ports, the skilled labor employed at these ports, and the American taxpayer generally is robbed in order to fatten up the economies of Canada and a few Midwestern States. It certainly requires no precise definition or scholarly analysis to realize that building up Canadian commerce at the expense of American commerce is not in the public welfare, but since the Department of Agriculture has proved itself such an inept interpreter of the public welfare, the grave responsibility to legislate has devolved upon the Senate.

As the situation stands, now that the inspection and certification of grains is available at Canadian ports, the surplus grain commodities earmarked for foreign countries will be loaded into barges at midwestern lake ports, carried to the large Canadian Seaway ports, and there transferred to the final export vessel. By this arrangement, all the Seaway operators and all the foreign shippers who handle the bulk of Seaway exports will prosper and multiply. But let me emphasize, Mr. President, that for every dollar of new Canadian prosperity there will be a dollar less in the pockets of American labor and industry. And let me emphasize that this reallocation of economic resources to promote Canadian welfare has been ordered at the expense of the American taxpayer, with whose dollars the Commodity Credit Corporation purchases the surplus agricultural commodities for export.

It is argued that the present amendment deals a fatal blow to the great Midwest, that its enactment will cripple useful operations on the St. Lawrence Seaway. The argument is made that, since the Seaway project was constructed at great public expense, it should now be utilized to the greatest possible extent. This very line of reasoning was taken in a letter pertaining to the export grain situation which I recently received from the Department of Agriculture:

It is assumed that with substantial expenditures by the United States for development of the Seaway it should be used to the extent practical in exporting U.S. grain.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter in which this sentiment was conveyed be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D.C., August 4, 1959.

Hon. JOHN MARSHALL BUTLER,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR BUTLER: This is in reply to your letters of July 22 and August 3, 1959, in further reference to U.S. inspection at the Canadian port of U.S. grain transshipped through Canadian ports.

Prior to the meeting on July 21, we considered making U.S. grain transshipped through Canadian ports on the St. Lawrence Seaway eligible for financing under title I, Public Law 480, both on the basis of U.S. inspection at the U.S. lake port at which the grain was loaded and on the basis of U.S. inspection at the Canadian port. In discussing the situation with representatives of the Canadian Government we learned that it now requires the inspection of grain loaded to ocean vessels at St. Lawrence ports even though such grain was inspected at the time it was loaded to lake boats at Fort William and Port Arthur. This is a recent change with a view to providing high-quality grain for export.

The Department in 1933 discontinued the use of so-called split certificates in connection with grain loaded at the upper Lakes sold in Eastern States. Complaints have been received from foreign buyers concerning the quality of U.S. grains transshipped through Canada. It appears proper to require U.S. inspection of all U.S. grains exported under U.S. subsidy programs through Canadian ports. Inspection at Canadian ports of such grain provides information concerning the kind and quality of U.S. grain loaded to ocean vessels at Canadian ports and information with which to review the price paid by the foreign country, particularly with reference to grain obtained under title I, Public Law 480, for which the United States receives foreign currency in payment.

It is assumed that with substantial expenditures by the United States for development of the Seaway it should be used to the extent practical in exporting U.S. grain. We do not believe it can be determined at this time whether or not requiring U.S. inspection of U.S. grain transshipped through Canadian ports of itself will be or will not be detrimental to the port of Baltimore and other Atlantic ports.

Our current policy of a common subsidy for each grain exported from the gulf, the Atlantic coast, and the St. Lawrence Seaway permits the flow of grain the same as it would if there was no subsidy.

Enclosed is a copy of the Department's press release of July 23, which states that U.S. inspection at Canadian ports on the St. Lawrence Seaway will be required under all grain port programs if an export subsidy is paid including sales under title I of Public Law 480. The Public Law 480 title I regulations and other export program terms and conditions are in the process of being amended to require U.S. inspection of grain transshipped through Canadian ports on the St. Lawrence River. Copies of these amended regulations and terms and conditions will be furnished as soon as they are available.

The requirement that U.S. grain transshipped through Canadian ports on the St. Lawrence River be U.S. inspected at the Canadian port is an administrative requirement. The authority for such a requirement is in the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter and in Public Law 480, 83d Congress.

Recent freight rate reductions on grain shipped from the Midwest to the Atlantic coast have been of some assistance to the Atlantic coast. We understand that reduced freight rates on ex-lake grains from Buffalo to Atlantic coast ports are under consideration. We are not unmindful of the substantial reduction in the volume of grain moving in export channels from the Atlantic coast. The previous substantial volume exporting from Atlantic ports was either because of lower costs to the Continent or because the U.S. Government paid the difference.

It appears to us that the railroad companies and others interested in the exports from the Atlantic coast will find it possible to compete with exports from the gulf and the St. Lawrence Seaway to the extent that it is possible for them to make the necessary adjustments which will provided a landed cost on the other side competitive with other ports.

Sincerely yours,

MARVIN L. MCCLAIN,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, it is encouraging to note that the Department of Agriculture is so attentive to Seaway needs and interests. A mere glance at the statistics, however, offers convincing proof that the Seaway operation can look after itself. Monthly grain exports from the port of Baltimore now total 1,210,000 bushels, as compared with a maximum monthly volume of 12 million 3 years ago, the balance having already been diverted to Seaway outlets. And since the American Seaway ports have inadequate facilities to load full cargoes on their own, the practice of transshipment through Canadian ports has been established. In this way the full benefit of grain diversions has accrued to the Canadian economy, and the full loss has been absorbed by the American economy. A pointed illustration of this shift can be obtained by comparing the shipments of grain from North Atlantic ports versus Great Lakes ports for the 3-month periods of May, June, July, 1958 and May, June, July, 1959. On page 2 of volume 7, No. 32 of the Grain Market News published by the Grain Division of the Agricultural Marketing Service of the Department of Agriculture on August 14, it was shown that shipments out of North Atlantic ports have declined from 42,905,000 bushels to 25,436,000 bushels, or 42 percent during the 3-month period, while shipments from Great Lakes ports have increased from 7,126,000 bushels to 72,420,000 bushels, for an increase of 916 percent over the same period.

May I now give the figures for the port of Baltimore for the months of July and August 1959, as compared with July and August of 1958?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me for 30 seconds?

Mr. BUTLER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. MORSE. I shall ask that immediately following the remarks of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER], in support of the Bridges-Butler-Kuchel-Frear-Beall amendment, there be printed a copy of the amendment, to be followed by a series of telegrams I have received from constituents in the State of Oregon, such as the Commission of Public Docks of Portland, Oreg., the Commission of Public Docks of Oregon, the Wheat League, the Port of Astoria, and others.

In support of the amendment, I ask unanimous consent that the telegrams and a copy of the amendment be printed following the remarks of the Senator from Maryland. I wish to say to the Senator from Maryland I shall support his amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the figures I am about to give were published and compiled by the Baltimore Chamber of Commerce.

In July 1958 there passed through the port of Baltimore 4,688,033 bushels of grain.

In July 1959, 1 year later, we shipped but 1,210,038 bushels of grain, a decrease of over 70 percent in 1 year.

In August of 1958 there passed through the port of Baltimore 5,429,659 bushels of grain.

In August of 1959 the number has declined to 1,379,266 bushels, a decrease of approximately 70 percent.

On the basis of these figures, it would be difficult to contend that the Seaway is not participating to a practical extent in the exporting of U.S. grain. These figures, Mr. President, likewise show the imperative necessity that the Bridges amendment be added to the bill.

It is now proposed to extend the practice of transshipment through Canada to the export of surplus agricultural commodities. If this proposal is allowed to stand, the business and commerce generated by transactions authorized under Public Law 480 will in large measure be turned over to Canada. Baltimore, as well as other Atlantic and gulf ports, will be permanently denied the opportunity to participate in these relief export programs. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD several articles by Helen Delich, the fine maritime editor of the Baltimore Sun papers, in which is described the full devastating effect which further grain diversion will have on the metropolitan Baltimore area.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore (Md.) Sun, July 13, 1959]

UNITED STATES TO INSPECT GRAIN AT SEAWAY

(By Helen Delich)

The Department of Agriculture intends to provide official inspectors to clear U.S. grain transshipped through Canadian ports, despite protests by Baltimore port officials and those from other Atlantic and gulf coast ports.

The Agriculture Department announced yesterday that U.S. grain being exported under the subsidy programs can be shipped through Canadian ports on the St. Lawrence Seaway after September 1, only if U.S. inspection is obtained there.

And that inspection will be provided, Agriculture Department heads reported yesterday, to facilitate the marketing of U.S. grain in export channels.

FEE BASIS AVAILABLE

The service will be provided on a fee basis upon request with inspection and certification on the basis of U.S. official grade standards.

This action is expected to be seriously detrimental to the port of Baltimore, since it long was the leading grain exporting port on the east coast and has suffered other setbacks on this particular commodity in the last 2 years.

Pressure to provide U.S. grain inspectors was applied by midwestern farmers because they felt that their grain could move cheaper through Canadian ports with the all-water transportation provided by the St. Lawrence Seaway and, therefore, they could sell more abroad.

PROGRAMS INVOLVED

The move to permit the transshipment through Canada will apply to exports under the feed grain and wheat payment-in-kind programs and to Commodity Credit Corporation sales, the Department said, including those under barter and the CCC credit sales programs and those made at special export pricing.

For feed grain bids accepted under the export program and registered under the wheat program after September 1, official U.S. inspection will be required on exports through Canadian ports on the Seaway.

SAFETY DRIVE BEGUN

An on-the-job safety campaign, covering every operating location in the port of New York, was announced yesterday by the New York Shipping Association and the International Longshoremen's Association.

The program calls for the placement of 250 suitably framed messages in prominent positions on all piers. The safety messages will be changed every 2 weeks.

The two groups said each poster will point to a major cause of accidents. They hope to materially lower the accident frequency rate in that port.

The campaign is patterned after ones in other industries, but has never been tried on any waterfront in connection with longshoremen.

BEMBO ENDS CAREER

John D. Bembo ends his long career of service to the Federal Government today, his last day as area representative and chief of the Baltimore section of the ship repair and maintenance branch of the Maritime Administration.

He will be honored at a testimonial dinner August 10 at the Southern Hotel.

WATERFRONT SIDELIGHTS

(By Helen Delich)

The port of Baltimore is indebted at this time to a man from a neighboring (and usually competing) port on a matter that is of interest to both, but of more value to Baltimore.

The man is John H. Frazier, assistant director of port development of the Delaware River Port Authority, who has been serving as the chairman of a grain committee for the Atlantic and gulf ports, the principal purpose of which is to stop midwestern U.S. grain from being exported through Canadian ports.

Although all the ports of the Atlantic and gulf will be hurt if the Senate does not restrict to U.S. ports the shipment of Government-aid grain, Baltimore will be hurt the worst because the bulk of that midwestern grain has moved through Baltimore and Norfolk.

GULF HAS MORE COMEBACK

The gulf ports naturally will lose some, too, to the all-water northern route if big ships can be loaded fully with Department of Agriculture aid grain, but they will not suffer as much as Baltimore because they can offer an all-water river route for delivery from the farmlands.

Mr. Frazier, who has specialized in grain matters for nearly 30 years, has been working to get Congress to limit the movements of the grain which is being paid for indirectly by the U.S. taxpayers so at least the wages earned from these shipments will go into American pockets instead of into those in another country.

HOUSE BEAT PLAN BY EIGHT VOTES

The House of Representatives defeated the amendment by only eight votes last week. It is felt that a rollcall vote would have resulted in a victory for the limitation to U.S. seaports but the amendment was tied to other phases of the giveaway grain bill.

Now it will be up to the Senate to take action when S. 1748 is brought to the Senate floor this week. Already Senators BUTLER and BEALL, Republicans, of Maryland, have pledged their support to the limitation of this grain to U.S. ports.

However, Mr. Frazier feels it vital that labor unions and members make a strong drive to gain support from Senators throughout the United States in order to assure a victory in the upper House. This then would mean that the matter would go to a conference committee.

POSSIBLE VETO OF WHOLE BILL

Of course, there is a possibility that the bill to extend the grain program might be vetoed by the President because of a House-approved amendment adding a stamp plan for the distribution of grain to those in need. The Republicans seem opposed to the stamp method.

The loss in the House, therefore, leaves the grain issue far from decided and Mr. Frazier and his committee need support. Their success means money to the metropolitan area of Baltimore and the State of Maryland.

The fight to restrict aid shipments to U.S. ports resulted from a directive issued by the Department of Agriculture to place its own inspectors in Canadian ports after September 1 to inspect all grain transshipped through those ports.

The Great Lakes Congressmen know that right now they need the Canadian ports to top off the shipments of grain from their own areas, so they are going to support the Department policy.

EXPERT SEES NO SALES LOST

However, it is predicted that in 3 years, when ships can load full cargoes on their own at the lake ports, the lake ports will begin to suffer and pay for the business being pushed through Canada, which will then be well enriched.

The farm bloc claims the farms need the Canadian ports for the movement of their agricultural products because it is slightly cheaper than shipping to the Atlantic coast and then out.

And yet, when Representative BOYKIN, Democrat, of Alabama, acting chairman of the House Merchant Marine Committee, last week asked Walter C. Berger, Executive Vice President of the Commodity Credit Corporation, how many sales would be lost by shipping only through U.S. ports, Mr. Berger replied that probably none would be.

Those who are close to the scene feel there is more to the movement by the Department of Agriculture than meets the eye. What caused this directive is a question Maryland and other interests would like to know.

GRAIN MOVE IS DENOUNCED—CONGRESSMEN CHARGE AID TO FOREIGN PORTS

(By Helen Delich)

WASHINGTON, August 6.—The Department of Agriculture today was accused by several Congressmen of building up foreign ports at the expense of American ports—including Baltimore—and American shipping.

In a heated informal hearing before the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee—with several members of the House Agriculture Committee attending—the department was charged with deliberately injuring the United States by issuing a directive that will place U.S. grain inspectors in Canadian ports without consulting Congress or anyone else.

C. B. Palmby, in charge of the program for the Agriculture Department, told the committee under sharp questioning by east and gulf coast members that he was uncertain as to how American flag ships will be affected.

BOOST CONCEDED

He conceded that grain already is moving in unprecedented amounts through the St. Lawrence Seaway, that the directive would help raise the tonnage and that in 2 to 3 years the grain movements would be much higher on the seaway.

The directive is to go into effect September 1.

Representative GARMATZ (Democrat, of Maryland), a ranking member of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, called for the Department of Agriculture to rescind its order until "everyone had a chance to look into it and study every aspect and its affect."

This suggestion met with general approval of the other committee members who then decided to proceed with formal hearings. The first session will be at 2 p.m. Monday.

EXPORTER MENTIONED

The following statements were made at today's informal hearing:

1. That Cargill, Inc., a major U.S. grain exporter, probably was behind the directive because a 15 million-bushel elevator is being built for that firm at the mouth of the St. Lawrence River for year-round operation.

2. That foreign-flag ships now were transporting the bulk of the grain in and around the Great Lakes area and St. Lawrence Seaway.

3. That the 70th Congress had to put a stop to U.S. grain movements through Canada because American ports were being hurt at that time.

4. That there is considerable question as to whether the Department of Agriculture's move is legal under the Grain Standards Act.

5. That the Department of Agriculture opposed the 50–50 act which calls for the transportation of at least half of all Government-financed cargoes on American-flag ships if available at reasonable rates.

Representative DORN, Republican, of New York, declared the Department of Agriculture deliberately was evading the 50–50 act on a minor technicality in making U.S. grain more available for foreign-flag ships and that it was openly recognizing a foreign port to handle giveaway grain while hurting the economy of America.

Representative BOYKIN, Democrat, of Alabama, said he was amazed to discover on a recent trip to Canada—for the official opening of the seaway—that the Canadian dollar was firmer than America's and that Canada is in much better financial shape than this country.

"America is being ruined already. We're in terrible shape," the southerner said. "We have got to look out after ourselves and not Canada."

John H. Frazier, an executive in the Delaware River Port Authority, and chairman of the Atlantic and Gulf Ports Grain Committee, said the Department of Agriculture issued its directive less than 48 hours after his group and the North Atlantic Exporters Association asked that the inspector service not be provided to Canada.

He charged that the matter had long been settled and that their appeal had not even been considered.

Capt. Andrew Crinkley, of Isbrandt Co., told the committee that he felt it a crime to punish the ports on the Atlantic by building up Canadian ones and charged that apparently a considerable amount of political pressure was applied for the Agriculture Department to act as it did.

WATERFRONT SIDELIGHTS

(By Helen Delich)

There is a hearing today on whether U.S. grain inspectors should be placed in Canadian ports and the importance of the hearing was emphasized last week when the chamber of commerce reported that Baltimore had exported less grain in July than in any other month since before World War II.

The St. Lawrence Seaway was cited as the principal reason for this sudden plunge to 1,210,000 bushels of export grain moving through what once was the Nation's leading grain exporting port.

WILL GET WORSE, OFFICIAL SAYS

A Department of Agriculture witness said the situation probably would worsen for eastern seaports rather than improve over the next 2 or 3 years.

Therefore, if it is made still easier to move U.S. grain through ports outside this Nation, Baltimore and other eastern ports are in for even more hurt than is already provided in the natural movement of grain through the ports bordering the new inland waterway.

The drop already charged to the seaway and grain movements down the Mississippi River and the port of New Orleans amounts to $1,500,000 in revenue lost monthly to the Baltimore metropolitan area.

FROM 12 MILLION TO 1

And if one compared the 1,210,000 bushels to the 12 million bushels this port was exporting monthly only 3 or 4 years ago, the dollar loss to this area would run as high as $3 million.

Various cost studies show that a ton of grain is worth about $12 to a metropolitan area.

This embraces the longshore work, the elevator operation, the railroad haul, truck movements, the handling of the ship into and out of the port, and numerous other costs. Grain has to be trimmed, and even though automatic trimmers now are used, trained men must operate them.

THIRTY-MILLION-DOLLAR ANNUAL LOSS SEEN

Grain ships must be sealed, cleaned, and prepared properly to permit the grain to be loaded aboard.

When one begins to add up the effect of the loss of grain to this metropolitan area, one realizes that the dollars lost here run well above $30 million annually.

Representative GARMATZ has suggested that the agriculture officials put off the September 1 date now set for opening inspection offices in Canadian ports until Congress has time to study the directive.

MAY BE ONE-BROKER PLAN

Actually, it was indicated at the preliminary hearing last week that the plan was initiated by one grain broker which does business internationally but which has headquarters in the United States.

It was testified that the Canadians are building a large elevator for Cargill, Inc., to operate near the mouth of the St. Lawrence River on a 12-month basis.

And it was said Cargill wanted U.S. grain inspectors and expected to slip through the directive from the Department of Agriculture without opposing ports even realizing what had happened.

SEAWAY RATE WAR SEEN

Despite its success on grain, the Seaway apparently is not producing sufficient quantities of cargo to keep all of the steamship lines operating there happy.

That is the reason the three German lines announced last week they were withdrawing from conference operation on the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway.

Their withdrawal virtually means they intend to initiate a rate war up there so they can take all the cargoes available by offering lower rates than conference lines can offer.

MARITIME BOARD NOTIFIED

The Federal Maritime Board was notified Friday of the lines' withdrawal officially. However, it is doubtful that the Federal agency can intervene.

What effect a rate war on the seaway might have on the east coast is anybody's guess, but it could be detrimental. If the freight rates are lowered sufficiently, more general cargo could be channeled to seaway ships even though they take a longer time to make the inland trip than those moving directly in and out of Baltimore or other Atlantic points.

The German lines can afford to lower their rates below the conference price, but American lines cannot.

FOREIGN COSTS ARE LESS

All foreign ship costs are cheaper than those under the U.S. flag, so that if foreign ships obtain freight rates equal to those of U.S. ships, their profits are higher than are the Americans.

Under a conference, all member lines must charge the same rate on all commodities. These rates usually are scaled to afford the highest priced operator, United States Lines, a profit on their ships. Thus it protects U.S. ships in that others cannot quote lower prices because their costs are lower.

The break in the conference is not to become effective until September 1, the same date this country is supposed to assign grain inspectors to Canada. That should be an eventful day to the port of Baltimore.

[From the Baltimore Sun, Sept. 2, 1959]

GRAIN-PLAN DAY PASSES—NO INSPECTORS PUT IN CANADA PORTS ON DATE SET

(By Helen Delich)

WASHINGTON, September 1.—Today was the day the Department of Agriculture was supposed to begin stationing inspectors in Canada to approve the quality of U.S. giveaway grain exported through Canadian seaports—to the detriment of Baltimore and other American ports.

But no permanent inspectors have been assigned there yet, although preliminary steps had been taken to place one man on duty in Montreal.

At the same time, the Department has been seeking support from all the various agriculture bodies of all the 49 States in what port interests refer to as a "backdoor method of trying to gain approval of an act they are afraid of."

DEPARTMENT BELIEVED SHAKEN

These actions suggest that the opposition, led by Atlantic and gulf coast port interests, to the Agriculture Department's directive has shaken the Department's assurance and made it try to rally its forces in the Senate against the proposed amendment that would limit to U.S. ports the exportation of grain financed by Uncle Sam.

An Agriculture spokesman said there are inspectors on call at Boston and New York whenever they are needed.

No staff will be set up, he said, until officials are able to measure the need by the volume moving through the Canadian ports. He guaranteed that the Department is prepared to go ahead when ready.

The move by the Department of Agriculture to gain support from the States is complicated.

The request to the various agriculture divisions in the States called for approval of an amendment to permit U.S. inspection of grain at Canadian ports.

A Department spokesman explained that this was routine and that it came under the 1,200 trust fund division of the act and was simply a means of assuring that the Canadian inspection service would be self-supporting.

He further explained that all agreements in this special group were self-supporting and that the Department could not take on additional agreements with the trust fund without circularizing all the States.

CLAIMS SOME STATES

However, he said that only a single State's sanction was needed to permit the Department to proceed with the plan. The spokesman said that more than 24 States have given their approval and that some were Atlantic Coast States whose ports were objecting to the original directive.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, is it the position of the Department of Agriculture that the American economy is not entitled to its share of the benefits accruing from Public Law 480 sales? Or is it the Department's intention to subsidize the growth and development of the Canadian economy with tax moneys collected from U.S. citizens? The American people deserve an answer to these questions. The railroadmen, the longshoremen, the grain elevator operators and the many others whose jobs and security the Department has found it convenient to forfeit deserve an answer to these questions. Yet, Mr. President, every attempt to elicit an answer on behalf of the American people has been either ignored or treated to evasion and doubletalk. Perhaps the reasonable motives which prompted the Department's action are so obscure as to be almost nonexistent.

If American vessels were expected to retain control of the diverted grain cargoes, the Department's action would at least make some sense. But every indication is that foreign-flag vessels have carved out the St. Lawrence Seaway as their own private domain. By way of illustration, I quote from an article which was published in the July 26 edition of the New York Times.

American-owned vessels are being squeezed out of the Great Lakes grain market, the Lake Carriers Association said today.

Grain shipments in June climbed to 1,691,775 net tons from 1,556,718 tons a year ago, the associated reported, but only 29 of 247 cargoes were hauled by U.S. vessels. A total of 165 cargoes were moved by vessels of Canadian registry and 53 by foreign ships.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the acting minority leader yield me time?

Mr. ALLOTT. May I inquire how much time the Senator desires?

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to have 5 minutes on the bill.

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Maryland from the time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized for an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, these figures represent an alarming shift of traffic to vessels of an alien flag, a shift which is apparently countenanced by the Department of Agriculture. The newly ordered inspection and certification of U.S. grains at Canadian outlets will empty the holds of the American vessels presently handling the Public Law 480 cargoes. It will transfer to vessels of foreign registry the substantial tonnages which belong to the American economy.

Far from being a mere technicality or administrative requirement, the installation of grain inspection stations in Canada will touch off a sweeping reorganization in the marketing of U.S. grain. Aside from its doubtful legality, this reorganization will lay waste to segments of the American economy which heretofore have served their country with great efficiency and distinction. No such ruinous discrimination was intended by Congress when it enacted the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and I urge that the objectives of this act be reaffirmed by the adoption of the proposed amendment. Mr. President, there is no reasonable or patriotic alternative.

There are limits to the lengths we can go in being neighborly without obscuring the national interest. We have now arrived at these limits, and if the present amendment fails, we will have arrived at a time in U.S. history when the water ties of an international seaway are stronger than the blood ties which bind together the States of our indissoluble Union.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement showing a comparison of charges on grain via Baltimore, Md., and via the St. Lawrence Seaway, from the Midwest to Rotterdam, Netherlands.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT 1

PORTLAND, OREG., August 27, 1959.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
U.S. Senate,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Reference conversation today relative Public Law 480, specifically S. 1748. We emphatically oppose legislation permitting the loading of surplus grain to vessel at any other than U.S. ports. Earnestly ask your best efforts supporting Kuchel or other amendment restricting such export loadings to U.S. seaports only. Reasons: First, believe situation parallels in principle 50–50 law regarding use of U.S.-flag vessels which Congress continues despite heavy foreign interest pressure. Second, believe danger inherent that surplus grain loading at foreign ports can be means to avoid 50–50 law, third, believe establishment of such principle can ultimately result in diversion of our own grain volumes in whatsoever degree to Canadian west coast ports with heavy loss to the United States; example, last 2 years Portland exported 2 million and 1½ million tons, respectively, grain surplus and other, while Columbia River including Portland exported 4¼ million and 3 million tons same years. Consider port earnings of $1.50 per ton conservative and even that figure demonstrates financial considerations at stake. Fourth, principle of S. 1748 without amendment inimical to heavy public investments here in particular and in all other U.S. public seaports. Fifth, we understand Kuchel amendment includes U.S. St. Lawrence Seaway and/or U.S. Great Lakes ports. Kindest personal regards same wire to Senator Neuberger tonight.

THOMAS P. GUERIN,
General Manager, Commission of Public Docks, Portland, Oreg.

PORTLAND, OREG., September 3, 1959.

The Honorable WAYNE MORSE,
U.S. Senate,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Understand S. 1748 regarding Public Law 480 pending forthwith. As per previous wires is grave concern to us and vital to entire grain trade our area. Following additional to economic points in our wire August 27. Columbia River averaged approximately 3½ million tons grain export last 2 years inclusive surplus grains. Estimating 15½ tons per longshore man-hour average hourly rate per man-hour, $3.10, means $700,600 total annual payroll from grain alone to longshoremen and exclusive all other earnings, such as rail and barge freights on grain to tidewater vessel earnings, etc. Add at least 10 percent for overtime, etc., and longshore payroll. This item alone aproaches $1 million annually. Aside from vicious principle in proposed diversion all economic considerations emphasize urgency your support of Kuchel amendment.

Kindest regards,

THOMAS P. GUERIN,
General Manager, Commission of Public Docks.

ASTORIA, OREG., August 24, 1959.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

We are advised that Senator KUCHEL is introducing an amendment to S. 1748 requiring grain distributed under Public Law 480 be shipped through American ports. Along with other Columbia River ports, we endorse this amendment. We would like to urge your studied consideration of the amendment and if possible, not only support it but jointly sponsor it along with Senator KUCHEL.

PORT OF ASTORIA,
R. J. BETTENDORF,
Manager.

ASTORIA, OREG., August 27, 1959.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

We repeat our urging to support KUCHEL's amendment to S. 1748. We are fearful that without such a restriction, it is conceivable that grain historically moving through Columbia River and Puget Sound ports could be diverted to British Columbia ports without justification.

PORT OF ASTORIA,
R. J. BETTENDORF,
Manager.

PORTLAND, OREG., August 20, 1959.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
U.S. Senate,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Re S. 1748 respectfully urge your support of amendment to this bill which will insure that all surplus agricultural commodities must be loaded at a U.S. port to vessel transportation goods from U.S. port of loading to foreign port of discharge. Best regards.

R. F. WATTS,
Commission of the Public Docks of the City of Portland.

WASHINGTON, D.C., September 1, 1959.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Re Public Law 480 ship operators west coast strongly support Butler amendment to curb Department Agriculture use of non-U.S. ports for loading surplus grain exports. Next step might be Agriculture desire use of Mexican ports for cotton or British Columbia for grain. Our member companies concentrate on serving U.S. ports and we don't want threat of getting squeezed out of our share of tax-financed exports when they move out of nearby foreign ports.

RALPH B. DEWEY,
President, Pacific American Steamship Association.

PENDLETON, OREG., September 1, 1959.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Urge your support of provisions to utilize St. Lawrence Seaway for U.S. grain exports in bill to extend provisions of Public Law 480.

FRANK TUBBS,
President, Oregon Wheat Growers League.

PENDLETON, OREG., September 3, 1959.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Oregon Wheat League position is to support whatever encourages sound movement of U.S. wheat into export. P. & W. is penalized by USDA's programing of 480 wheat from gulf ports, hence anything that improves movement of Midwest wheat improves our position for future exports. P. & W. wheat exports down 30 percent and carryover up 73 percent in past year. Seaway battle is over. Seaway exists and should be used. Topping cargos at Canadian points necessary to movement of U.S. wheat.

OREGON WHEAT GROWERS LEAGUE.

S. 1748, 86th Congress, 1st session, in the Senate of the United States—August 28 (legislative day, August 26), 1959—Ordered to lie on the table and to be printed

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BRIDGES (for himself, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. FREAR, and Mr. BEALL) to the bill (S. 1748) to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes: At the end of the bill add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. II. The Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 is further amended by adding at the end of title III a new section, as follows:

" 'SEC. 306. Shipments of surplus agricultural commodities destined to foreign countries, exported under titles I, II, or III of this Act, shall be delivered directly to the export vessel at a United States port. For the purpose of this section "export vessel" shall mean the ocean vessel transporting the surplus agricultural commodities from the United States port of loading to foreign port of discharge.' "

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. President, in effect, the pending amendment, by prohibiting the movement of any surplus commodities under titles I, II, and III by transshipment through Canadian ports, would effectively deny the use of the St. Lawrence Seaway for Public Law 480 grain exports. There is no man in the Senate who fought any harder than I to prevent construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway. I fought the issue for over 11 years. One of the main reasons I opposed the construction of the seaway was its cost—the over a billion dollars which would be assumed as an obligation by the United States.

Later, after the seaway finally had been built, the United States obligated itself to pay for that portion of the channel passing through the United States near Massena, N.Y.

Mr. President, since this seaway has been constructed I think it would be an error on our part to pass legislation to prevent the use of it, because that is exactly what the effect of the amendment would be. I know it may be difficult for the port of New Orleans, in my home State of Louisiana, to accept the transshipment of the grains through Canadian ports as a fact of life, but it is something which must be done.

I have been asked to vote for the amendment but, Mr. President, in all good conscience, I cannot see my way clear to do so. The seaway, although I opposed its creation, has been built. It exists. In my judgment, it would be the height of folly for us to deny the use of this facility. What is more, in my humble opinion, if the amendment were agreed to, it would be a direct slap in the face of our neighbor to the north, Canada.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I will yield in just a moment.

Mr. President, as I said, I regret having to take this position. I want to say further, I realize that there is the possibility that some of our ports will lose some trade because of these transshipments.

But I would like to point out that not only would the amendment prevent transshipment of the surplus commodities through the seaway, it would also deny the right of the ports of the Great Lakes to utilize their facilities to transship these surplus commodities to Canadian ports.

Mr. LAUSCHE, Mr. WILEY, and Mr. BUTLER addressed the Chair.

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator further explain his statement that the amendment would deny the ports of the Great Lakes their right to use their facilities?

Mr. ELLENDER. The ports of the Great Lakes are not deep enough to handle large cargo vessels. As a consequence, many smaller boats are used to transport grains to Canadian ports. From there the wheat or whatever surplus commodity is involved is loaded onto larger vessels.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I will yield in just a moment. There is no doubt that the amendment would deny ports of the Great Lakes the right and privilege to handle a good deal of this grain trade.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 more minute.

For the reason I have just stated, passage of this amendment would be a direct slap to our good friends to the north. That is one reason why I oppose the amendment.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I have very little time. I will yield 30 seconds to the Senator from Maryland for a question.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to say to the Senator, there is no intention to deprive the Great Lakes ports of their rightful share of the traffic. When the ports are able to handle the traffic we would expect, in normal course, that shipper would take the first available American port. However, when there is a bypassing of all the American ports, that is going too far.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time the Senator yielded has expired.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself a half minute.

The shippers are sending the grain to the Canadian ports through the Great Lakes.

Mr. BUTLER. Would the Senator allow me a half minute to answer?

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I do not care to yield to Senators. I wish I had time to do so.

Mr. President, as we know, the bill, S. 1748, with accompanying amendments, now before the Senate, proposes to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act—more popularly known as Public Law 480—for 3 years.

The extension of this program, I believe, is definitely in the best interests of the American farmer, national economy, and our foreign policy.

However, I am deeply concerned with the amendment, which, as I understand it, is intended to limit the ways and means by which surplus commodities could be shipped to overseas ports. Generally, the amendment reads:

> Any shipment of surplus agricultural commodities to be exported to a foreign country under this Act shall be delivered to the ocean vessel on which such commodities are to be transported to the foreign port of discharge only at a United States port.

Now, what would this amendment really do?

If adopted, it would prevent surplus commodities from being shipped by the most inexpensive method under Public Law 480 to destinations around the globe—that is, by way of the St. Lawrence Seaway.

As yet, limiting depths in channels of the Great Lakes prevent the traversing of large oceangoing vessels freely in and out of the Great Lakes through the seaway. As a result, it is sometimes necessary for commodities to be transferred from lake vessels to oceangoing ships at Montreal and other eastern Canadian ports.

The amendment, if adopted, would, first, substantially increase the costs of shipping surplus commodities from the producer to the foreign ports, thus hitting the American taxpayer a blow; second, the increased costs might well prevent shipment of as large a volume of surplus commodities—thus further hurting the American farmer, already sharing too little in the national economy, by eliminating an outlet for surplus products; third, the extra costs would provide a handicap to programs of relief to needy people, as well as adversely affect sales of such produce abroad; and fourth, it would reduce traffic on the St. Lawrence Seaway in which the American people have a $140 million investment, which is depending upon maximum volume to pay of its construction.

The attempt to serve eastern or gulf coast interests at the cost of the American taxpayer, I believe, is completely unjustified. By preventing surplus farm commodities from being shipped at the lowest possible cost, the amendment would also have the effect of being a handicap to the international program.

Unrealistic, unjustified, and unwarranted, the amendment, I believe, should be defeated.

Overall, this amendment—camouflaged in innocent sounding words—would extensively damage the Public Law 480 program. We recall that it was defeated in the House of Representatives. The Senate, I would hope, will also reject it.

Over the years, we recall that there has been a long-running battle with eastern and gulf ports, as well as the railroads, to complete the St. Lawrence Seaway. To a great many of us, it had appeared that the battle was won with the enactment of the seaway legislation in 1954; and more finally, with the completion of the project itself, in June of this year.

Unfortunately, however, we find these same interests continuing to sabotage efforts to fully utilize the traffic opportunities of the seaway.

Naturally, I can appreciate that Members wish to look out for the interests of their constituents. However, I believe that when these efforts run contrary to the interests of the American taxpayers, as well as threaten to jeopardize such an important program as Public Law 480, they certainly should be defeated.

Now here are some facts on the comparative costs of transportation. These rates are for the movement of wheat from Duluth and Minneapolis to Antwerp or Rotterdam:

First. Ocean vessels, direct from Duluth to either of above destinations, $9.25 per long ton.

Second. Lake vessels to Montreal or lower St. Lawrence ports, then transferred to ocean vessels, to above destination, $10.15 per long ton.

Third. Barge via Mississippi to New Orleans, then transferred to ocean vessels—plus demurrage, if any—$11.70 per long ton.

Fourth. Lake vessel, Duluth to Oswego, N.Y., New York State Barge Canal to Albany, N.Y., then transferred to ocean vessel, $13 per long ton.

Fifth. Lake vessel, Duluth to Buffalo, N.Y., then railed to North Atlantic port, namely, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, to October 1, 1959, $14.50 per long ton; after October 1, 1959, $13.80 per long ton.

From these facts, it is evident that it will cost the U.S. taxpayer or foreign purchaser all the way from $1.55 to $3.65 more per ton, depending upon the route, to transport surplus agricultural commodities overseas under the programs of Public Law 480, if the amendment proposed by Senators BRIDGES, BUTLER, KUCHEL, FREAR, and BEALL is approved by the Senate.

The effect of the amendments will be to eliminate the transshipment of surplus commodities under this act at Canadian ports such as Montreal and Baie Comeau and will prohibit United States-Canadian lake vessels from carrying surplus grains to eastern Canadian ports as the return cargo for iron ore, brought into the lakes. As this is the most economical means of transporting both iron ore and grain in and out of the Middle West, it will thus not only impose a penalty on the Great Lakes transportation system and reduce the amount of traffic through the St. Lawrence Seaway, but, in addition, will increase the cost of transporting these surplus agricultural commodities, most of which is borne by the U.S. taxpayer, by from $1.55 to $3.65 per ton.

Recognizing the inequities which would be created if such an amendment is adopted, I contacted the State Department to get its views. In response I received a letter from Acting Secretary Douglas Dillon.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter from the Acting Secretary of State be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., August 28, 1959.

The Honorable ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: In your letter of August 27 you called my attention to the amendment to S. 1748 tabled by Senator BUTLER, requiring that the shipment of surplus agricultural commodities under Public Law 480 be from U.S. ports and asked for the Department's comments.

The amendment would discriminate against the Great Lakes ports and the St. Lawrence Seaway project, a venture which we have recently hailed as an achievement with few historic parallels. It might add substantially to the cost of the Public Law 480 disposal programs. We can anticipate that the adoption of such a restriction would attract considerable adverse comment in Canada.

Until the St. Lawrence Seaway is in condition to accommodate fully loaded oceangoing vessels, a requirement that products shipped under the authority of Public Law 480 be loaded only at U.S. ports, would virtually exclude Great Lakes ports from participation in the export trade created by that law. At present grain shipments may be made from Great Lakes ports with transshipment at Canadian ports under both titles II and III of Public Law 480. The Department of Agriculture has announced that title I exports will also be eligible for these shipping arrangements beginning September 1, when official U.S. inspection service will be available at Canadian ports of the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Since most oceangoing vessels cannot yet safely navigate parts of the St. Lawrence Seaway when fully loaded, they customarily proceed to Canadian ports to complete their cargo after having taken on partial loads at lake ports of the United States. The grain taken on at Canadian ports has been previously carried there from U.S. lake ports by lake vessels. Regardless, therefore, of whether grain is transshipped through Canadian ports, initial loading takes place in lake ports of the United States.

As it would be uneconomic for oceangoing vessels to operate without full loads, the exclusion of Canadian ports from sharing in the handling of Public Law 480 grain would force such vessels to go to ocean ports for their full cargoes. This will clearly discriminate against our lake ports and would retard the development and the use of the St. Lawrence Seaway. It might also add substantially to the cost of the Public Law 480 surplus disposal programs. The extent of such increased costs would depend on ocean freight rates, rail rates to seaport destination of the grain shipped, and other factors.

The Department appreciates the opportunity to comment on this proposal and hopes that the amendment will not be adopted.

Sincerely yours,

DOUGLAS DILLON,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, it seems to me that a point of order could be raised against this amendment, and I raise the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes from the time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin insist upon his point of order at this time?

Mr. WILEY. I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes on the bill, on the point of order.

Mr. President, I stand here as a representative of a great State. This bill is literally loaded with amendments which are not germane.

A point of order has now been made against the amendment.

I am here pleading for the vital interests of my home city and my State; I feel at least entitled to the expression of the U.S. Senate on whether Americans should be denuded of their economic rights and have them turned over to a foreign nation.

I say this to the Senate. We cannot set up an inspection system under the present ruling of the Department of Agriculture that will not bring down on the head of the United States on every shipment of grain an appeal that it is not up to grade, for the following reason: We inspect the grain when it is loaded on the barge at the Great Lakes ports. It is then transshipped. We lose control of it. It may get mixed up with other grain. It may be of grade; it may not be of grade. We do not know what it is at the actual time of export.

The foreign country, under the inspection provisions of the act, have a right to appeal that the grain is not up to standard, and the United States is helpless, because as I have said, it did not see the grain when it finally went to the ship for export and therefore will have no defense.

I say this should not happen in the national interest. When we are so willing to help other people that we are ready to denude the great seaports of America on the western and eastern seaboards and on the gulf coast overnight, with no notice, in 1 short year, taking 70 or 75 percent of their trade away from them, I say we are being just a little too neighborly.

Mr. WILEY. I press my point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. I say the people of America do not want to be that neighborly. We should look out for America now and then.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the forceful arguments the Senator has expressed in terms of the port of Baltimore. I believe his arguments apply equally to the other great ports of our country which now are equipped to ship grain. Only yesterday the administration announced that there was a big trade deficit, and that they are worried by the thought that we are losing the advantage in the balance of payments. Here is one of the aggravating factors; namely, the dollars that are being spent and sent abroad for shipping.

Mr. BUTLER. I completely agree with the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, how much time remains on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seven minutes remain on the amendment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I understand that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I also understand that we are limited to one-half hour of debate on each amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

The Senator from Wisconsin has indicated that he insists on his point of order. The Chair is prepared to rule on the point of order.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I am opposed to the Butler amendment. However, in view of the fact that the yeas and nays have been ordered, I certainly hope that we will have an opportunity to vote on the amendment, to vote it up or down.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, before the Chair rules on the point of order, with respect to the germaneness of the amendment, I hope the Chair will take into account the substance of the amendment. It explicitly refers to the shipment of commodities exported under titles I, II, or III of the act. It is very difficult for me to understand how an amendment which pertains directly to titles I, II, or III of the act could be ruled to be nongermane.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take that into consideration.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). The Senate will be in order. The Chair is prepared to rule on the point of order raised by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY]. In the opinion of the Chair, the pending amendment is not germane to any provision in the pending bill. The amendment is related to the shipment of surplus agricultural commodities, a matter not covered by any provision in the pending bill. Therefore, the point of order is sustained.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I desire most respectfully to appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the right of the Senator from California.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK. Is the motion subject to debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is subject to debate for 30 minutes.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I shall be very brief.

The substance of the amendment deals with American surplus grain raised by American farmers, owned by the American Government, and paid for by dollars from the American Treasury raised in taxes from the American people.

The relevant part of the amendment provides that the shipments of those surplus agricultural commodities destined to foreign countries "shall be delivered directly to the export vessel at a U.S. port."

That is all this does. It ought to be adopted. It ought to be adopted overwhelmingly. There is nothing in it which discriminates against any one section of the ports in the United States. This simply and solely says a U.S. port.

Surely, Mr. President, the Members of the Senate ought as a body to write into the legislation now before it the text of the amendment. It is for that reason, because I feel that the Chair's ruling is open to some technical question, that I have availed myself of my right to appeal, most respectfully, from the Chair's ruling.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. Do I have time on this amendment, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The appeal is debatable for 30 minutes.

Mr. KUCHEL. I am glad to yield 1 minute to the able senior Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I should like to make one remark to my colleagues. I do not intend to vote for the amendment, but because of the situation in which we find ourselves on the floor of the Senate, it is my hope that the Senate will give the same opportunity and consideration to the amendment which has been presented that it gave to all the other amendments presented today which are not strictly germane to the bill. While I shall not support the amendment, I certainly do intend to support the appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. KUCHEL. I now yield 5 minutes to the able Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, since it appears that the decision as to whether or not the Chair is to be upheld or overruled on this point of order will be determined largely by the attitude of individual Senators toward the amendment itself, I should like to say something, first of all, in opposition to the proposed amendment. Then I shall say something, at the end of my time, about the germaneness of the amendment and the disposition of the point of order.

I am opposed to this amendment, Mr. President, not only as a Senator and a taxpayer but I am opposed to it from the standpoint of the American farmer, whom, after all, the pending bill, to extend Public Law 480, is intended to help. The proposed amendment definitely is to the disadvantage of our farmers and to all who pay taxes.

We are trying very hard to reduce the huge surpluses of grain and other crops. It is costing a great deal to dispose of those surpluses. This proposal to amend Public Law 480 would add to that cost without giving any advantage to farmers or anyone else except a few railroads and port facilities on the eastern seaboard. This amendment, by preventing surplus farm commodities destined to move to foreign countries from going to a Canadian port on the seaway and then being transshipped, would mean sharply higher shipping costs to the American farmer.

It seems to me it would be sheer folly for the U.S. Congress to adopt a measure approving a seaway and then adopt a bill providing that we cannot use the seaway after it is developed.

I am reminded of a piece of doggerel which was bounced around in South Dakota when I was a boy:

Father, father, may I go out to swim?
O, yes, my darling daughter,
Hang your clothes on a hickory limb,
But don't go near the water.

Should we adopt the pending amendment we would be building this great seaway, but we would also be saying, "Do not use it. Do not let it help the farmer for whom it was intended. Do not go near the water."

Why should we spend millions of dollars to build a seaway and then take action such as that proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER]?

Some of our agricultural problems have been caused by the fact that we have not had proper legislation dealing with transportation facilities. The question of denying the export of agricultural products through the seaway should not be permitted to rise and becloud a successful program such as that proposed in Public Law 480.

The proposed amendment to Public Law 480 takes advantage of the fact that the seaway is unable to accommodate large seagoing vessels fully loaded from the lake ports. The entire seaway just will not take a full 10,000-ton cargo. Therefore, it is necessary to limit to a partial load the loading of most of our farm products that we are exporting.

If we were to adopt the Butler amendment, it would be equivalent to placing a quarantine sign against the use of this great seaway by the farmers of America for the shipment of their products.

Competition is keen in world markets for the farm commodities which we export. We are paying hundreds of millions of dollars in export subsidies in order effectively to compete in the world market.

We are already providing for taking care of the question of rates for the shipment of American commodities overseas in American ships and now an effort is being made to exclude us from using the seaway to get our grain en route to foreign countries.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Previous to the opening of the seaway it cost 70 cents a bushel to get wheat from Bismarck, N. Dak., to Buffalo, N.Y.

It was estimated by the Department of Agriculture that the average rate established by the various steamship companies for transportation from Buffalo, N.Y., to Rotterdam was an additional 23.6 cents a bushel. The cost of shipping a bushel of wheat was already more than 90 cents a bushel. The opening of the seaway reduced that cost by 10 to 15 cents a bushel, depending upon the place from where it was shipped.

The Canadians had enjoyed an advantage over us. They have not had a freight rate increase since 1895 on grain shipments moving from their prairie provinces.

Our farmers are attempting to compete with the farm commodities of Canada and other nations of the world, and yet it is proposed to saddle still another burden upon them.

I ask to have inserted in the RECORD at this point, a story appearing in the Washington Post of September 4, 1959, headed "Farm Exports Fell Below 1958 Imports."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARM EXPORTS FELL BELOW 1958 IMPORTS

In a reversal of form, the United States imported more agricultural products during the year ending July 31 than it exported.

In the previous 12-month period, the exports exceeded the imports.

Preliminary figures put exports during the year at $3,720,450,000 in value and imports at $4,005,258,000. In the preceding year, the exports were $4,001,820,000 and the imports $3,929,422,000.

Agriculture Department officials said the decline in foreign sales during the past year largely reflected a sharp drop in cotton sales. United States cotton prices were above world levels.

An upsurge in exports is expected during the 12-month period ending next July 1, largely on the basis that cotton has been returned to a competitive price basis in world markets.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. For the first time in quite a while our imports exceeded our exports. If we cripple the Public Law 480 program, we shall have a still worse situation, and agriculture will be in still more trouble. Agriculture really is in trouble, and before long the whole Nation will be adversely affected.

Mr. MUNDT. The Senator is exactly right. Since wheat is an international commodity, the price of wheat is always quoted as "less transportation," and the farmer consequently suffers a sharp increase in transportation costs when he has to ship by rail, because he is denied the right to ship by water.

The purpose and objective of Public Law 480, both title I and title II, is to stimulate additional exports of U.S. agricultural commodities. It would be the height of inconsistency to adopt legislation prohibiting use of the St. Lawrence Seaway in the implementation of the Government export programs.

We would be trying to go in two directions at the same time, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is precisely correct in raising a point of order against such legislative inconsistency.

I strongly urge that the proposed amendment to Public Law 480 not be adopted.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I wish to associate myself with the argument made by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota as to the main issue before us. I ask the Senator from South Dakota this question: Is it not a fact that if the amendment is adopted, it will cost the American farmers around 16 or 17 cents a bushel in additional costs?

Mr. MUNDT. The Senator is entirely right, depending upon where the farmer is located. However, transportation always costs all American farmers a very substantial amount, and instead of permitting Public Law 480 to work to the advantage of the agricultural industry, it would make it work to the disadvantage of the agricultural industry.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I think it has been calculated that the average cost from the Midwestern States affected would be increased by 16 or 17 cents a bushel.

Mr. MUNDT. I believe the Senator's statistics are correct.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. Is it not true that this amendment would not only take from the farmers what has been stated, but would also take from the economy of the Great Lakes what it has now? I say that because smaller vessels which are transporting grain to Montreal will continue in that process until the larger vessels can get through. I know what my good friends from the East want. I do not blame them. We had to fight them until the hot spot really froze over to get the St. Lawrence Waterway through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator.

Mr. WILEY. If that is the case, the strong words used by my good friend from Maryland are not apt at all. He suggests that we are taking something from them. The only thing that we are claiming is that which belongs to us. The wheat is grown in the Midwest and West, and its natural channel of disposition is where it has been going continually.

Mr. MUNDT. The Senator is exactly correct. If this amendment were adopted, we would be in worse shape than we were before the passage of Public Law 480, so far as shipping is concerned; and as one who has been an early vigorous and consistent supporter of the St. Lawrence Seaway since before the time I came to Congress over 20 years ago, I believe it would be a travesty to have an amendment of this kind fastened on a piece of legislation designed to help the American economy and designed to help the American farmer, providing a market for disposal of his surplus products.

Mr. President, I wish to say a word on the point of order raised by the Senator from Wisconsin. This legislation is designed to aid the export of agricultural surpluses and to make them available, under a series of formulas, to people in foreign countries. The Butler amendment deals with something entirely remote from that. It deals with what might be described as a maritime problem. I believe the Chair has ruled precisely correctly in saying it is not germane, and I hope the Members of the Senate will sustain the ruling of the Chair if that issue is brought to a vote and the point of order is not withdrawn. However, this is an issue which sooner or later must be decided on merit, so perhaps the point of order should be withdrawn, and the amendment defeated now while all Senators have the arguments clearly in mind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. KUCHEL. I now yield 2 minutes to the able Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL].

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota a question. Is it not a fact that the subsidies on grain raised in the United States are paid by all the taxpayers in the country?

Mr. MUNDT. In the first place, the Senator from South Dakota states that he denys that subsidies are paid on grain raised by the American farmer. There is a price support program, but it is not a subsidy by any means. Frequently the American Government has made money in the disposition of grain it has been required to claim for its ownership under the price support program.

Mr. BEALL. There is no difference between a subsidy and a support program.

Mr. MUNDT. If the Government is getting a profit, it is not paying a subsidy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield 1 minute more to the Senator from South Dakota, in order that he may yield further to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, until recently the Department of Agriculture has required that surplus agricultural commodities destined for oversea ports be shipped through U.S. ports. This requirement was implemented through regulations directing that the commodities in question must be inspected and graded by U.S. grain inspectors who were stationed only at U.S. ports.

On July 23, 1959, the Department of Agriculture announced modifications in its requirements which have become effective on September 1, 1959. Under the new regulations, the Department will establish official grain inspection services at Canadian ports.

The net effect of this change will be to divert millions of tons of commerce away from United States ports and into Canadian ports.

I rise to oppose this practice that will subsidize the development of Canadian ports with Federal funds and, at the same time, deprive our own ports of much needed commerce.

We must not forget that the commodities shipped under Public Law 480 are subsidized under programs that represent a major item in our Federal budget. It seems to me that the price supports could serve a dual purpose if we required that the commodities be shipped through American ports. In this way, we would be benefiting both the American farmer and the American port of shipment rather than the Canadian ports which will become heir to this new windfall under the Department's regulations.

It is interesting to note that the St. Lawrence Seaway was financed by all the taxpayers of the United States. The grain in question is subsidized by all the taxpayers of the United States. Yet we now find themselves in the embarassing position of taking from a large segment of our population their very livelihood. I refer to those people who live and work in the vicinity of those U.S. ports which will lose millions of tons of commerce if this amendment is not adopted.

I refer to the workers who service these great ports—the men who load the ships; the men who transport this grain to the ships; I refer to all those men and their families who take part in the process of delivering a bushel of grain from an American port to a foreign port. I am thinking of our merchant marine fleet which is already losing millions of tons of commerce to foreign bottoms.

I am thinking of the railroads whose plight we recognized through legislation last year.

Mr. President, the failure to adopt the Bridges amendment will deal a severe blow to millions of Americans who will nevertheless continue to pay taxes which will benefit not the ports of Baltimore or New York, but, of all places, the port of Montreal.

The Department of Agriculture is presumed to issue regulations that are in the public interest.

I submit that any regulations which have the effect of diverting commerce from American ports to a foreign port are not in the public interest.

Since the enactment of Public Law 480, agreements signed under its authority have represented some $3,700 million in foreign currencies.

A report of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry dated July 15, 1959, shows the following totals of shipments which have been made or will be made under this program, as follows: 840 million bushels of wheat; 4 million bales of cotton; 33.5 million bags of rice; 210 million bushels of feed grains; and 250 million pounds of tobacco; as well as other commodities.

I repeat, Mr. President, that all the taxpayers of the United States contribute to the subsidization of these commodities. Yet, we are told that it will be necessary to establish an inspection service at Canadian ports.

I fail to see how this can possibly be in the public interest. I fail to see how any program favoring foreign ports over those of the United States can be in the public interest.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I urge the adoption of an amendment to S. 1748, which would require that shipments of surplus agricultural commodities destined to foreign countries, exported under titles I, II, or III of Public Law 480, be delivered directly to the export vessel at a U.S. port.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from California has expired.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes on the bill to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, we are not arguing the merits of this question. We are arguing whether the point of order is well taken or not. That comes under the question of germaneness. I simply make this point: The grain has to go abroad in ships. It has to go abroad somehow. It cannot get to Europe or anywhere else unless it is moved in ships. To say that the port where a ship shall be loaded shall be designated seems certainly to be germane to the bill. I am not arguing the merits as expressed by the Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from North Dakota. The only question before the Senate is the point of order on the ground of germaneness.

I submit most respectfully that when grain has to be moved by ship, the port on the Atlantic seaboard where the grain must go can be designated.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes on the bill to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I agree with the statement of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. I support his position as to the germaneness of the amendment. I also associate myself with the general sentiments expressed by the two distinguished Senators from Maryland. I will support the amendment.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not ask for them. There will be a lot of trouble securing the withdrawal of such an order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I withdraw my request at this time.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I oppose the ruling of the Chair. I shall confine my remarks at the moment to the point of order; later I shall speak briefly on the amendment.

The Chair has ruled, on the advice, of course, of the Assistant Parliamentarian, that the amendment is out of order because it is not germane to the bill. But, Mr. President, if this amendment is out of order, then all the amendments which the Senate has been voting on for the last few days have been out of order.

What does the amendment propose to do? It purports to amend section 2 of the Agricultural Trade and Assistance Act of 1954 by adding a new section, section 306. That was what the Senate did 45 minutes ago when the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, of myself, and other Senators was agreed to and a new section, 306, was included in the bill. That is exactly what we did on Friday, when we were debating the bill, when the distinguished Senator from Minnesota was bringing up amendments. The distinguished Senator from Minnesota was bringing up amendment after amendment after amendment. This amendment does nothing more than those amendments were intended to do. It puts a new section in the bill. If this amendment is out of order, so is every amendment which has gone before.

The amendment adds a new section to the Agricultural Trade and Assistance Act. It is directly pertinent to the act. It provides that surplus food called for to be shipped to foreign countries under the act will have to be shipped from American ports. If that is not germane to the purpose of Public Law 480, I do not know what germaneness is. It seems to me that the ruling of the Chair was erroneous, and I ask the Chair to withdraw it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I hope Senators will indulge me for a few minutes, because I think we are about to do a number of Senators a decided injustice.

The Senate is operating under a unanimous-consent agreement. The Senate, as all Senators know, has no rule of germaneness. The only reason why a point of order would lie, if one does lie—and I do not believe it does—is that a unanimous-consent agreement is in effect. The only reason why the provision relating to germaneness is incorporated in unanimous-consent agreements is that several Senators, including the able senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], have insisted that when we have unanimous-consent agreements, we require that a provision relating to germaneness be included, so that controversial riders such as civil rights cannot be added from time to time without the knowledge of Senators. That has been the only reason for the provision relating to germaneness. That was the only reason why it was included in this unanimous-consent agreement.

I doubt that many amendments which the Senate has considered thus far with respect to Public Law 480 would have been held to be germane if the majority leader or any other Senator had decided to make a point of order. I stated that the other evening to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. I told him that if any Senator decided to make a point of order on his amendments, they could be ruled out on the ground that they were not germane; but that if such a ruling were made, it would not be keeping faith with the Senate, and it would not be in accord with what Senators agree to when they enter into unanimous-consent agreements.

There is no Member of the Senate for whom I have greater respect or affection than the present Presiding Officer, the distinguished senior Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT], whom I have known for a number of years. He is carrying out the advice which the Assistant Parliamentarian gives him. I respect the judgment of the Assistant Parliamentarian. He knows much more about the rules than do any of us, although in this instance I think he is wrong, and in this instance I do not believe a point of order should lie.

I regret that the Chair has made the ruling he has made. I regret that the point of order has been raised.

I hope that if there is no other way to get out of this situation, so as to keep faith with all of us, the Senate will vote to override the ruling of the Chair, so that we can then vote on the merits of the amendment.

I am not prepared to discuss the relative merits of the amendment, but all Senators ought to be willing to let the amendment stand on its own bottom, without having to raise a point of order.

As the Senator who submitted the unanimous-consent agreement, and who has submitted a great many of them in the past, in an attempt to expedite the action of the Senate, I may say that I did not anticipate that a point of order would be raised. I do not think it properly lies. I think the amendment is germane. I hope the Senate will vote to override the ruling of the Chair, if that becomes necessary. I do not believe Senators should want to rely on a unanimous-consent agreement obtained for another purpose in order to withhold a vote on any amendment.

Senators can do no more than pass upon it after a few hours, because when we are not operating under a unanimous-consent agreement, as we will not be in a few minutes, the amendment can be offered to any other bill, and then a vote can be had on the merits of the question. So I do not see why we do not take a vote now on the merits of the amendment. If it is necessary to vote to override the ruling of the Chair, I am willing to vote to override, notwithstanding what I have said about my great respect for the present occupant of the chair. It was never the intent of the unanimous-consent agreement to bar amendments such as the one offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER] or the ones offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY].

I can imagine the furor which would have gone up in the Chamber if we had technically applied the present ruling of the Assistant Parliamentarian to each amendment which has been offered.

I believe in the Golden Rule, doing unto others as I would have them do unto me. I think in this instance the sponsors of the amendment have a right to try to "sell" it on the basis of its being good for the United States; and that the opponents have every right to oppose the amendment on the ground that it would be damaging to the country, and thus probably defeat the amendment. But I hope it will not be necessary to refuse to vote on it merely because it is held not to be germane. I think a reading of the amendment by any lay person will indicate that it is germane. He will conclude that it is germane. But if we use the yardstick of the ruling of the Chair on this amendment, I believe all the other amendments would have to be ruled out too.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I agree with every observation the majority leader has made in regard to the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. MORSE. I think we all know, as the Senator from Texas has pointed out, that the only reason why the language of germaneness was included in the agreement in the first place was to protect Senators who are opposed to civil rights legislation from having any civil rights riders attached to proposed legislation.
